There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

KEEP PLUGGING, PADRE

Pleading for congressional action on Padre Island before this session ends, Senator RALPH YARBOROUGH said in Washington he believed 90 percent of Texans favor preserving a substantial part of this grand 110-mile stretch of sea, sun, and sand as a national seashore.

Make it 99 percent, Senator, and you still might be short.

And count us twice, please. We fervently hope you can find the key to action even though this session's remaining days appear due to be crammed with other matters.

With all our heart we say to you, Senator YARBOROUGH, keep fighting for Padre until they turn off the congressional lights.

Padre may not win through this time, but a good fight for a cause such as this is never wasted. It will give Padre's supporters a better start next session.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. YARBOROUGH. I would be glad to yield, but I do not have the floor.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, I shall be glad to yield if the time is extended by the amount of time consumed by these observations.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Mr. President, I commend the Senator for what he is doing in connection with Padre Island. Seashores and lakeshores are being rapidly gobbled up by real estate developments and by industries. The population explosion is narrowing and diminishing with every year the amount of land available to the public. We have in the Midwest a great natural resource in the Indiana Dunes. Mr. George Humphrey, president of National Steel, the Bethlehem Steel Co., and the Northern Indiana Public Service Co., seem to be determined to destroy that resource, and they are aided, I may say, by politicians in the State of Indiana.

I hope very much the plea of the Senator from Texas may strike responsive ears so in the near future we may be able to develop a national park in the Indiana Dunes, to be connected with the Indiana State park.

We have a teeming population in the Midwest and in the metropolitan area of Chicago. It is essential that we act now before the land disappears forever and is replaced by an asphalt jungle.

I commend the Senator from Texas for his noble efforts. I hope that the country will be responsive, not only to his pleas, but to the pleas of the Senator from Alaska and the rest of us who believe that it is important that man should have a place of quiet to go to where he may escape from the stresses and strains of modern industrial life.

Mr. YARBOROUGH. I wish to express my appreciation to the distinguished senior Senator from Illinois for his statement on this question. When I first came to the Senate 39½ months ago, the distinguished senior Senator from Illinois and the late beloved Senator Richard Neuberger, of Oregon, were leading this fight, and are still leading it, for the creation of these seashore areas on the oceans and Great Lakes. We believe that Padre Island is one of the most crucial areas, because it stretches for 90 miles without a single obstruction. It is being rapidly subdivided. Unless the Government acts now, it will be lost forever. The executive department, despite some of the criticisms which have been made against it, sees the danger and has recommended and pleaded that Congress act. Hearings were held on Padre Island in December. The time to act is now.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield further?

Mr. YARBOROUGH. I yield further.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I am delighted that the Department of Interior is being of help in connection with Padre Island, but the Department has been of no help whatsoever so far as the Indiana dunes are concerned, because their friend and master, Mr. George Humphrey, is trying to destroy the dunes.

Mr. YARBOROUGH. I regret very much to hear that. I am, of course, very pleased with the manner in which the Department is helping with the Padre Island project. We need these areas on the east coast, on the Gulf of Mexico, on the Pacific coast and on the Great Lakes.

As the wilderness areas are being fenced, man is being fenced off from the oceans, off from the water, which has been regarded from time immemorial as the heritage of everyone. It has been said, "The sea belongs to everybody," but one cannot get at it. There are few places man can get to the sea.

There are 3,700 miles of shoreline from Brownsville, Tex., up along the Gulf of Mexico and the Atlantic coast to the easternmost point on the coast of Maine. Out of those 3,700 miles of shoreline, there are only 265 miles of public parks and beaches. That includes the Federal parks, the State parks, and the county parks.

The millions of people who pour through this one Capitol Building alone, as exemplified by the visitors in the last 2 weeks, are a demonstration that the American people are seeking out the evidences of their heritage, the historical spots of America. These people also travel to the seashores and to the mountains. We need more recreation areas. We have only a small part of what we should have.

The best park area upon the whole Gulf of Mexico, Padre Island, which should be a public area, is being subdivided now. Unless we move fast we shall lose that area.

Mr. GRUENING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. YARBOROUGH. I yield.

Mr. GRUENING. I wish to associate myself fully with the very stimulating remarks of the able junior Senator from Texas and with the comments of my friend, the senior Senator from Illinois.

I think there is nothing more important for the Congress to do than to move quickly in regard to those shorelines, and preserve them for posterity before they are destroyed.

I wish to invite the attention of the Senate, in connection with the comment of my friend from Illinois that the Department of the Interior has not been of help, in the case of the Indiana dunes, to the fact that the conservationists have not helped there, either. In the June issue of the Sierra Club bulletin there is an article written by Charles H. Callison, who is a well known and respected conservationist. Everybody who knows him admires his dedicated efforts in favor of conservation. He recently moved over from an executive position in the Wildlife Federation and became the assistant to the president of the Audubon Society.

He mentions the shortcomings of the 86th Congress in the field of conservation. I agree with much that he says. He lists four shore areas which need to be set aside: Cape Cod, Padre Island, Point Reyes, and the Oregon Dunes.

He does not mention the Indiana Dunes, which is at least as pressing a need as any other. Along with the able junior Senator from Utah, who is now occupying the Chair, I was a member of a Senate subcommittee which studied this area and reported favorably on Senator DOUGLAS' bill to preserve it. Not only is it a unique and priceless natural area, but it is adjacent to the second largest concentration of population in our Nation, and an area which is in the process of being ruined. It is as essential as the others. All of them are important. Why did Mr. Callison omit mention of it? I think it is tragic that we have let this session of the Congress go by without setting off the Richard L. Neuberger shore and thereby preserving the Oregon Dunes. All of these areas have required action.

I congratulate the Senator from Texas for bringing this matter so eloquently before the Senate. I hope we can get action in this final session of this Congress at least on Padre Island, for which he has labored so devotedly.

Mr. YARBOROUGH. I thank the distinguished Senator from Alaska.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, I yield 2 minutes to the distinguished Senator from Connecticut [Mr. DODD].

MRS. OKSANA KASENKINA

Mr. DODD. Mr. President, on July 24, while Congress was in recess, the press wires carried the news of the death of Oksana Kasenkina, the courageous woman who, in August 1948, stirred the hearts of free men everywhere by her desperate leap to freedom from the third floor window of the Soviet Consulate in New York.

By her desperate act of heroism and by her personal ordeal before this act, Kasenkina became a symbol both to the free world and the Communist world. She became a symbol of the indestructible spirit of freedom, a symbol of the millions of ordinary people behind the Iron Curtain who would also escape to freedom if there was any way to escape.

In her person too, she became a living indictment of the Communist regime—an indictment that moved men more than all the broadcasts of the Voice of America—an indictment, indeed, that shook the Kremlin.

When Mrs. Kasenkina sought refuge in the Tolstoy Foundation farm, she was, in Soviet eyes, guilty of an impermissible act of defiance; she was guilty of asserting her rights as an individual, and her will to freedom. This is something that the totalitarian tyranny of communism can never tolerate. The entire Soviet apparatus of terror, from the biggest wheel to the smallest wheel, immediately went into action against this simple unknown Soviet schoolteacher.

Under the direct command of the Soviet Ambassador in Washington and the Soviet Counsel General in New York, a gang of armed Soviet pluguglies, protected by diplomatic immunity, descended on the Tolstoy farm, abducted Mrs. Kasenkina by force, and held her prisoner in the Soviet Consulate, in the very heart of Manhattan. Mrs. Kasenkina escaped by means of the famous leap, which almost cost her life.

In its understanding of communism, the free world seems to suffer from a kind of undulant fever. There are times when it seems to be approaching understanding—but then immediately, or almost immediately, the desire to forget and forgive and to coexist reasserts itself.

The kidnapping and imprisonment of the little Soviet schoolteacher in the full view of the press corps in New York, stripped the Soviet regime of the mask of civilization and legitimacy. It revealed Soviet communism, for the whole world to see, as a regime which was born in crime and which maintains itself in power by terror and kidnapping and mayhem and terror. For a brief moment in history, the free world seemed to understand.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that as a simple tribute to Oksana Kasenkina, the Russian schoolteacher who leaped to freedom, there be reprinted in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD at this point the New York Times article of July 27, in which the story of her life and of her leap were reviewed.

I hope that her story will be retold and retold, and that the lesson she taught us will be restudied.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

MRS. OKSANA KASENKINA DIES—FLED FROM RUSSIANS HERE IN 1948—TEACHER LEAPED TO FREEDOM FROM CONSULATE WINDOW—BECAME CITIZEN IN 1957

Mrs. Oksana Stepanovna Kasenkina, who jumped from a window of the Soviet consulate here in 1948 to avoid going back to Russia, died Sunday of a heart ailment in Miami, Fla. She was 63 years old.

Her death was reported here yesterday by the Tolstoy Foundation, which was involved in the international cause célèbre created by Mrs. Kasenkina's desperate leap to freedom.

As she told it later, she had schemed to get a job that would take her to the United States. Mrs. Kasenkina was a teacher of natural science in Russia and at length managed to get a post in New York instructing the children of Soviet officials of the consulate and the delegation to the United Nations.

In 1948 she was ordered to return to the Soviet Union and was booked on a ship leaving New York on July 31. Mrs. Kasenkina avoided sending her baggage to the ship. She sought the help of anti-Communist Russians, and on the day she was scheduled to sail she fled to the Tolstoy Foundation's Reed Farm at Valley Cottage, N.Y.

PERSUADED TO RETURN

Russian consular officials accused the Tolstoy Foundation of having drugged and kidnaped her. Mrs. Kasenkina wrote to the consulate from the farm in an effort to explain what she had done. The Russians descended on the farm in a limousine and persuaded the would-be defector to return to the consulate. They contended later that they had had to fight off "White Russian bandits."

On August 7, at the consulate, Mrs. Kasenkina faced reporters, and through an interpreter told them the kidnap story—a tale she said later she had been instructed to tell by the then Soviet Ambassador, Alexander S. Panyushkin, and the then Consul General, Jacob M. Lomakin.

Meanwhile, an organization called Common Cause, Inc., obtained a court order directing Mr. Lomakin to produce Mrs. Kasenkina in court. Common Cause charged she was being held against her will.

Mr. Lomakin, however, refused to comply. Mrs. Kasenkina remained incommunicado in the consulate, scheduled for return to Russia.

On August 12, Mrs. Kasenkina looked out a window of the consular dining room on the third floor and saw a telephone wire strung across a courtyard below. She climbed out the window and jumped, aiming for the wire. She hoped it would break her fall. It did.

BECAME U.S. CITIZEN

She was taken to the hospital with multiple fractures and internal injuries. Besides freedom, another legacy of her leap was a slight limp with which she walked until her death.

After her act, Mr. Lomakin demanded her return to Soviet jurisdiction. The United States refused. Subsequently, Mr. Lomakin was ordered by the United States to leave the country. He died in 1958.

When Mrs. Kasenkina recovered, she went into partial seclusion. She wrote a book of her experiences, "Leap to Freedom," published by Lippincott, in which she described the repressive atmosphere of life in Russia and of the lives of Russian officials in the United States. She earned $45,000 through a syndicated series. She became an American citizen in 1957.

Mrs. Kasenkina was born in the Ukraine, which has a tradition of independence and resistance to domination by Moscow. Her husband, she said, had been "taken away" in the purges of 1937, and she never saw him again. Her only son was killed in World War II.

IN MIAMI FOR YEAR

Mrs. Kasenkina had been living at the Gralynn Hotel in the downtown section here under the name of Mary Kamita. A few of the elderly women who live at the hotel knew her history. However, they, too, kept it a secret.

Her physician said she had been ill since coming to Miami a year ago. Mrs. Kasenkina moved around considerably since her escape, even after she became an American citizen. She was brought to the Gralynn by John M. Dyer, a lawyer, and a marketing instructor at the University of Miami.

"She told us she was the woman who jumped out of the window to get away from the Communists," said Mrs. Emma Seery, one of the hotel guests.

"She didn't seem scared, but appeared to be nervous," Mrs. Seery said.

The former teacher came to Mrs. Seery's room almost every night and talked until about 9 o'clock, mostly about Mrs. Kasenkina's poor health. She walked with a cane.

Mrs. Seery believed that the U.S. Government had paid for Mrs. Kasenkina's upkeep.

Mrs. Kasenkina's only survivor is a sister, Mrs. Eugenia Robertson of Devon, England.

STREET MOBS AND SOVIET FOREIGN POLICY—ARTICLE BY DR. MILAN GAVRILOVIC

Mr. DODD. Mr. President, yesterday I had the pleasure of reading an article entitled "Street Mobs and Soviet Foreign Policy," written by Dr. Milan Gavrilovic for the Bulletin of the International Peasant Union. I consider this article to be the most profound and significant analysis of this subject that I have yet come across—and I earnestly hope that all of my colleagues will find the time to read it and to weigh its words.

Dr. Gavrilovic—who should not be confused with the Yugoslav Communist diplomat Dr. Stogan Gavrilovic—is one of the most outstanding representatives in exile of the captive peoples of Europe. He has in his lifetime served as editor of Politika, Yugoslavia's foremost newspaper; as president of the Serbian Agrarian Party; as a leader of the democratic opposition to the authoritarian regime of Prince Paul; as first Yugoslav ambassador to Moscow; as a member of the Yugoslav government in exile during the war; and now, as a leader of the International Peasant Union, which coordinates the policies of the European peasant parties in exile.

Dr. Gavrilovic, who lives in Washington, is now 78 years old. But according to his friends, the passing years have only sharpened his wisdom and acumen. The well-known author, Rebecca West, who has known many of Europe's great men, has described Dr. Gavrilovic as one of the few authentic wise old men of Europe.

Dr. Gavrilovic, in his article, points out that the street mob is becoming an increasingly important instrument of Soviet policy. He does not say that the people who participated in the recent riots in Turkey and Korea and Japan were Communist; on the contrary, he makes the point that the overwhelming majority of the rank and file participants were non-Communist.

Nor does Dr. Gavrilovic argue that the governments set up subsequent to these riots are pro-Communist. His point is that, by overthrowing legally constituted government after legally constituted government by mob action, the Communists are weakening the fabric of government authority and creating a condition of general anarchy which may very well lead to their seizure of power.

Dr. Gavrilovic also argues that this trend of events must impose on the West a bold revision of its foreign policy. The principle of noninterference in the internal affairs of other states is useful and honest, he says, and should be respected in normal circumstances in dealing with states which themselves respect the principle of noninterference. Moscow, however, does not respect this principle—it lies when it says it does.

The only way in which the West can survive, concludes Dr. Gavrilovic, is to accept the challenge. He points out that in all of the recent riots, the overwhelming majority of the citizens have stood passively by, even though they did not approve of the action of the mob. Some means, he says, must be found to overcome this inertia of the majority.

Finally, Dr. Gavrilovic implies that we should respond to this new Communist offensive with a prudent but serious liberation policy.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD at this point the article by Dr. Milan Gavrilovic entitled "Street Mobs and Soviet Foreign Policy."

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

STREET MOBS AND SOVIET FOREIGN POLICY

(By Dr. Milan Gavrilovic)

The mistakes made by the West at Teheran and Yalta, added to a widespread misconception of the Communist danger, the success of Stalin's trickery and the tragic enthusiasm of leftist intellectuals, the first victims of Communist propaganda, combined to allow the Soviet Union to take over nearly a half of Europe and to expand the Communist empire's borders from the Baltic Sea through Berlin, central and southern Europe all the way down to Greece, and in Asia as far as the shores of Japan.

The harmful consequences of this expansion began to make themselves felt immediately. The famous "sanitary cordon" around the U.S.S.R., so often complained of by Stalin, was at one stroke transformed into a series of much stronger advanced posts of aggressive communism against the West. This quickly brought alliances between the free peoples and the construction of American bases on their territories. And thus a new "sanitary cordon" was born, an entirely defensive world cordon around the U.S.S.R. and Communist China. Hence the uneasiness in Moscow and the cries of "American militarism and imperialism." Moscow was not sure that one day, in reaction to its permanently aggressive policy, this defensive cordon wouldn't be transformed in an offensive one. Moscow feared a new general war, knowing that all these free peoples, if provoked, would turn against the Communists.

Fear of a world war has grown constantly from the day Khrushchev seized power, together with the growth of popular unrest in the U.S.S.R. and in all Communist countries, unrest that led to revolt in Berlin and in Hungary, to nearly open criticism of communism in the U.S.S.R. itself, to strikes of workmen in Soviet factories, to student anti-Communist movements and to open admission of the Communist parties that they have lost the youth. These unpleasant developments inside the U.S.S.R. have provoked a dangerous reaction against Khrushchev among many Communists who have already held Khrushchev responsible and regard him as the gravedigger of communism. Hence the need for Khrushchev to succeed on the domestic front within the Communist states and within the free states. The precondition for his success on this domestic front is world peace. Hence the policy of peaceful coexistence and absolute disarmament without absolute control.

It should be noted, however, that any success of Soviet foreign policy in this direction means only a guaranty for the success of the Soviets in the domestic struggle, a struggle which, despite its internal nature, is of tremendous international importance. Hence the intermingling of the internal affairs of a country with the international affairs of the same country, Communist or free. The policy of peaceful coexistence and disarmament formulated by Khrushchev will serve him well as a shield behind which to intensify and to win the great battle on the internal front, in Communist countries as well as in free countries. So great is his belief in this idea that he is risking the accusation (already being hurled at him) of revisionism, the most dangerous accusation that a Communist can incur.

In his main speech in Bucharest, on June 22, he said: "We cannot repeat today mechanically what Lenin said many decades ago * * * that imperialist wars are inevitable as long as socialism has not triumphed all over the world * * * We live in a time when we have neither Marx nor Engels nor Lenin with us. * * * Based on Marxist-Leninist teaching we must think for ourselves, we must thoroughly study life, analyse the present situation and draw conclusions that are useful to the common cause of communism. All this entitles us to assert with certainty that under present conditions war is not inevitable. He who does not understand this does not believe in the force and creative possibilities of the working class, underestimates the strength of the socialist camp and has no confidence in the great attractive force of socialism which has manifestly demonstrated its superiority over capitalism."

In other words, he is telling his Communists to be calm, to accept his no-war policy in order to be able to use all their means for the internal propaganda war of hatred. He might have quoted from the recent letter of Miss Mary Heyward, an American missionary who runs a jungle dispensary in the Belgian Congo. A group of Communists were holding meetings near the dispensary. They were promising everyone a car, a big brick house, and free medicine. They were telling people the white man has prevented the African people from having everything the people in Europe and the United States have.

"At a big meeting last week the speaker asked, 'Brothers, will you stand with us when we kill all the white people?' There was thunderous applause and shouts of 'Yes, yes'" (from Miss Heyward's letter in the Washington Daily News, June 22, 1960). Can anyone really believe that Mr. Khrushchev is using "peaceful coexistence" to stabilize the democratic order—that Mr. Khrushchev is trying by this method to win the world for freedom?

In the Far East, recent Tokyo events point up clearly the real aims of the Soviet policy of peaceful coexistence. The unrestrained joy with which the Moscow papers have openly and triumphantly greeted those events show clearly that the aim of the present Soviet policy is to achieve on the internal front what they know could not be achieved by an external war. It cost them nothing, not a penny and not a drop of their own blood.

In this internal war, the street mob is a powerful weapon in the hands of the Soviets. In Korea, the street mob has overthrown Syngman Rhee; in Turkey it deposed Menderes, and in Japan it is overthrowing Kishi. In none of these cases were Communists in the majority. On the contrary. But in each of these cases the Communists have exploited general dissatisfaction, have magnified it, organized it and led it. Their strategic principle was to try to help overthrow by force every government until, in the general anarchy that ensued, they themselves could seize power by force. In each of these cases—Korea, Turkey, and Japan—the government came to power legally, in the manner provided by the constitution and the laws of each of these countries. In each of these cases the street mob was overthrowing the legally constituted governments, and in each of these cases the street mob was overthrowing governments which were resolutely for the West against Moscow. Is this not proof of who is directing the street mobs? In none of these cases did the street mob wait for elections to change the governments legally. Why? Because in none of these cases was Moscow certain that her local allies would get a majority against the United States. This did not prevent the Moscow newspapers from greeting this latest success of the Communist-agitated street mobs as a great victory of the democratic movement. Moscow uses the street mob as a weapon in this internal war, not only to win the battle on that front, but also in order to weaken the international prestige and position of the United States in the world. Moscow attempts to terrorize America's allies by threatening them with hydrogen bombs against their bases if those allies do not remove American bases and if they do not cancel treaties with America of mutual assistance in case of aggression, such as the treaty recently signed with Japan.

Just recently in his speech in Bucharest, on June 21, Khrushchev impertinently warned the American people to be careful about their choice of a future President in November, for Moscow is "interested in the election of such a President and the formation of such a Government as would remedy the mistakes made by the present Government of the United States." He did not hesitate to call the cancellation of President Eisenhower's visit to Japan a public slap in the face, and he went on to boast: "The gloomy puppet, Syngman Rhee, has been flown out of Korea. The former Premier of Turkey, Menderes, an obedient executor of American orders is in prison. * * * In short, in the countries from which American imperialists have not yet been kicked out, the peoples' wrath is building up and the forces of protest are mounting." Is it not clear from these words who is directing this peoples' wrath and these forces of protest?

And who is helping Moscow? Who is helping it now in Tokyo? The so-called intellectuals of the left, the Socialists and Social-Democrats? They all shouted together with the Communists, "Down with the dictatorship," although they should have been well aware that the help they are giving Moscow would lead, in the last resort, to Communist dictatorship, their own enemy.

And what else was helping Moscow, with help that could, and may yet, play a decisive role? Sadly enough, it is the passivity of the great majority of the population in Tokyo and throughout Japan. This passivity means a kind of very dangerous internal neutrality in the great struggle of freedom against dictatorship and slavery. This internal neutrality is just as dangerous as neutrality in the international field in the present situation. It leads directly to catastrophe, to capitulation of freedom itself, if the majority of the people does not come to its senses and accept the challenge to fight with the same, and even stronger, means in this field too, and in every other field where the Communists are trying to defeat the forces of freedom. If the Communists try to win over the street mob, the challenge must be accepted there and won there, just as it is at voting places before elections and in parliament after elections. To use only the police is often not enough. The police act out of duty, democratic masses act out of conviction. Government in a democracy is the government of majority in freedom. If that majority capitulates before the onslaught of illegally used force, that majority does not deserve a better fate.

It is merely a living corpse, just what the Communists presume it to be. The overwhelming majority in Petrograd, in 1917, looked on passively at the attack of the street mobs directed by Lenin, and this ended with the eruption of that street mob into the first freely elected Russian parliament. The mob dispersed the Duma's legally elected members and installed in their place a Communist dictatorship. If free peoples today are not able by their own active majority to save their freely elected governments, then they are ripe for Fascist or Communist dictatorship, and have no one else to blame.

It seems to us that this trend of events must impose on the West a bold revision of its foreign policy. The Soviets have transferred the most important center of their activity to the internal front. The challenge must, therefore, be accepted and sought on that same front within the Communist countries too. The center of activity must be transferred from the practice of empty formal policies with the Communist governments to the formulation of real policy with regard to the enslaved peoples. The principle of noninterference in the internal affairs of other states is very good, useful, and honest and should be respected in normal circumstances in dealing with normal states, those states which respect the principle themselves and understand that the idea of reciprocity is an integral part of the principle of noninterference. Moscow respects that principle only formally. In reality, as we have seen, it interferes everywhere in order to win the battle on the domestic front, both at home and abroad. The West is bound to accept the challenge on that same front. It cannot escape the challenge if it wants to survive. It must accept the fact that today, in this great struggle, the internal policy of the Communist camp is intertwined with its foreign policy, a foreign policy which serves only to shield their struggle on the internal front everywhere. A victory over the Communists on this internal front is equal to a victory in any military war against the Communist bloc. Capitulation on this internal front is equal to capitulation and defeat in a military war with the Communist camp.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, reserving my right to the floor, I yield 5 minutes to my distinguished friend from Wisconsin.

SEVENTY-SIX-YEAR-OLD WIDOW CANNOT AFFORD $82 HOSPITAL BILL ON $33 SOCIAL SECURITY CHECK

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, I received a letter recently from a 76-year-old woman who may have to drop her regular health insurance because the rates have gone up so cruelly. This letter is another excellent example of why this Congress should pass a medical care bill for our aged that will do the job.

I ask unanimous consent, Mr. President, that this letter be printed at this point in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

DEAR SIR: I would like to express my opinion on the medical care for the aged. I am 76 and a widow and I am paying into the Blue Cross which is the only company which will take people over 65 in this territory. With the continuous raise in prices, I am afraid I will have to drop it.

Why must they keep raising prices of insurance when they know older people cannot earn the money to pay? Not only do the prices raise, but they have decreased the benefits.

I have paid into this company for 18 years, and every year the rates have gone up; and since they have now limited the hospital care to 3 weeks in 1 year and then pay for only half of the room, it is impossible for us to keep up. An older person is unable to receive adequate treatment.

I would have to pay $82.20 for 3 weeks' care and I am only receiving $33 social security. So, I would like to ask you to put forth all your effort to pass the bill which would give us medical insurance we would be able to pay.

EXPERTS COMMEND SOCIAL SECURITY AS BEST METHOD OF PROVIDING HEALTH INSURANCE FOR THE AGED

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, I have been putting these letters into the RECORD every legislative day since the middle of May. I should like to invite the attention of Senators this afternoon to a letter which was published in the Washington Post and Times Herald this morning, signed by a Mr. Fauri and a Mr. Schottland.

I wish to say that both of these men are intimately connected with social security. Mr. Fauri has been a consultant on social security matters selected by the distinguished chairman of the Committee on Finance, the Senator from Virginia [Mr. BYRD]. Mr. Schottland is a former Commissioner of Social Security appointed by President Eisenhower.

This is the conclusion which these men have on the kind of health bill we should pass. I shall read briefly from the letter.

At about the time the Senate Finance Committee was conducting its hearings on the House-passed social security bill, we solicited the opinion of over a score of individuals, who have long been identified with the American system of social security—having served the Government in administrative or advisory capacities—with respect to the most effective method for financing health care benefits for the aged.

The use of the social security system was unanimously endorsed as not only the most fiscally responsible approach but also the most practical approach from an administrative standpoint.

Among the endorsers to this approach were four past Commissioners of social security, three of whom had been appointed by President Eisenhower, and a number of distinguished students of social security.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the letter be printed in the RECORD at this point.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. Moss in the chair). Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Wisconsin?

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

HELPING THE AGED

Shortly, there will be before the Senate the social security bill of 1960. It is our earnest hope—shared, we know, by your newspaper—that the Senate will pass the bill approved by the House (H.R. 12580) with an amendment that would at least initiate a program of health care benefits to older people through the use of the social insurance principle.

At about the time the Senate Finance Committee was conducting its hearings on the House-passed social security bill, we solicited the opinion of over a score of individuals, who have long been identified with the American system of social security—having served the Government in administrative or advisory capacities—with respect to the most effective method for financing health care benefits for the aged.

Among the endorsers to this approach were four past Commissioners of Social Security, three of whom had been appointed by President Eisenhower, and a number of distinguished students of social security.

We think it is significant that a substantial and distinguished group of administrators and students of social security consider the social security system as the necessary and desirable instrument in meeting the health needs of older people. We have seen no similar broad-scale endorsement of the proposal of the administration which seeks to meet these health care needs through Federal-State grant-in-aid programs which, since it requires an income test, has a kinship to the public assistance or means test to the needs of people.

FINANCE COMMITTEE BILL DENOUNCED AS MISERLY BY WASHINGTON POST

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, I wish to read now from an editorial which was published this morning in the Washington Post and Times Herald, which has the following to say about the bill discussed by the distinguished senior Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. KERR] the other day and which is to be introduced momentarily by the Finance Committee.

The bill reported out by the Senate Finance Committee is a shabby joke. It would make available to about 2.4 million persons eligible for old-age assistance or relief as much as $12 a month extra in Federal funds to meet medical costs; and another 10 million elderly persons might get some help if the States proved willing to pitch in and if the recipients proved themselves too poor to pay their own doctor bills. The measure passed by the House before Congress recessed for the conventions is about equally meager and miserly.

The editorial goes on to say:

Senator MCNAMARA has a comprehensive, adequate plan which would furnish its own financing, without any imbalancing of the budget, through an increase in the social security tax. And this is clearly the way, we think, that medical and hospital care for the elderly must eventually be devised—as part of the social security program.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the entire editorial be printed in the RECORD at this point.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

AIDING THE ELDERLY

Everyone, it seems, wants to provide medical care for the country's senior citizens. But between Republicans and Democrats, conservatives, and liberals, presidential candidates and committee chairman, there are such divergencies of opinion that the chances of getting a sensible and satisfactory measure passed by Congress and approved by the President during the current special session seem slight. We think, as we said before the session began, that this is a problem which can wisely be left until it can be debated with greater leisure and sobriety next year.

The bill reported out by the Senate Finance Committee is a shabby joke. It would make available to about 2.4 million persons eligible for old-age assistance or relief as much as $12 a month extra in Federal funds to meet medical costs; and another 10 million elderly persons might get some help if the States proved willing to pitch in and if the recipients proved themselves too poor to pay their own doctor bills. The measure passed by the House before Congress recessed for the conventions is about equally meager and miserly.

Senator KENNEDY says valiantly that the Senate Finance Committee bill "must be rewritten on the floor of the Senate before the Senate goes home. This Congress should not adjourn before it enacts a comprehensive, adequate plan to meet * * * medical needs." Well, Senator MCNAMARA has a comprehensive, adequate plan which would furnish its own financing, without any imbalancing of the budget, through an increase in the social security tax. And this is clearly the way, we think, that medical and hospital care for the elderly must eventually be devised—as part of the social security program.

But it is unlikely to be worked out on the floor of the Senate in a special session in which presidential politics is unescapably the dominant consideration. And if it is worked out in the Senate, it is unlikely to pass the House, in view of the atmosphere likely to prevail there during the next few weeks. And if it passes the House, it is unlikely to win the approval of a President who has made it plain that he means to exercise his veto power until next January.

The truth is that there is no way to reconcile the so-called voluntary administration scheme with the broad social security aid plan promised in the Democratic platform. And an attempt to reconcile them under current pressures is likely to result in a thoroughly unsatisfactory measure which may foreclose a clearer bill next year. It would be prudent for the present to focus on the special session's unavoidable special business.

HERBLOCK NAILS FINANCE COMMITTEE HEALTH BILL TO THE MAST

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, unfortunately it is impossible to have cartoons printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. There was published in the Washington Post and Times Herald this morning a cartoon on this subject which, for once, coincided with the editorial which appeared in the Washington Post and Times Herald. This coincidence is worthy of note all by itself. It has been said that a picture is worth 10,000 words. This cartoon depicts the health insurance issue far more eloquently than all the words I have heard or read on the issue.

Mr. President, I shall do my best to describe the cartoon by Herblock very briefly. It is a drawing of a fat, self-satisfied gentleman attired in a velvet cutaway, wearing spats, and labeled "administration proposal." He is handing a sign to a thin, tired, old, tattered, obviously ill, man who is leaning shakily on a cane.

The sign from the velveteened administration dandy reads, "I am a pauper and need medical care."

In the other hand, the administration fat-cat hands to this tired, old, ill man a tin cup and pencils. The caption on the cartoon is, "Of course, I want to help the aged—Here."

It seems to me that this cartoon symbolizes perfectly the attitude of the administration, the Senate Finance Committee majority, and the attitude of those who support an answer to the desperate need of our old people for adequate medical care by saying, "If you will take the pauper's oath, if you designate yourself a pauper, then, but only then, we will give you a little handout. But first humble yourself. Put on this pauper's oath. Wear it. Brand it on. Surrender your dignity. Then we'll help you."

Contrast this, Mr. President, with the social security approach which would give the millions of old people on social security health insurance as a matter of right, a right they had earned by their own contribution, a right for which they had paid. The real issue here is simple human dignity and the right of millions of Americans to preserve it.

FAIR LABOR STANDARDS AMENDMENTS OF 1960

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 3758) to amend the Fair Labor Standards Act of 1938, as amended, to provide coverage of employees of large enterprises engaged in retail trade or service and of other employers engaged in activities affecting commerce, to increase the minimum wage under the act to $1.25 an hour, and for other purposes.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, pursuant to my earlier announcement, I submit an amendment in the nature of a substitute for the pending bill. In so doing, I call attention to certain changes that have been made. The words "or service" are written in after the word "retail" on various pages; and one whole paragraph has been deleted.

For the benefit of Senators who wish to follow the text, I should say that the proposed amendment was introduced by the Senator from Arizona [Mr. GOLDWATER] as a part of a whole sheaf of amendments and substitutes on August 10. It is designated "8–10–60—I."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment offered by the Senator from Illinois will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed to strike out all after the enacting clause and insert the following:

That this Act may be cited as the "Fair Labor Standards Amendments of 1960".

The minimum wage rate so specified shall apply in lieu of the minimum wage rate specified in paragraph (1) of subsection (a) with respect to an employee described in section 13(a)(1) or (2) of this Act, prior to the effective date of the Fair Labor Standards Amendments of 1960, and not included in any exemption provided by section 13(a) as amended by such amendments."

EFFECTIVE DATE

SEC. 7. This Act shall take effect on January 1, 1961, except that where the application of an amendment made by this Act to section 6(b) or 6(c) of the Fair Labor Standards Act of 1938 would result in a conflict with the terms of a bona fide individual contract or an agreement made as a result of collective bargaining by representatives of employees, which is in writing and was entered into more than thirty days before the date of enactment of this Act, such amendment shall not take effect until the date of the expiration of the contract or agreement or January 1, 1962, whichever date first occurs.

Amend the title so as to read: "A bill to amend the Fair Labor Standards Act of 1938, as amended, to provide coverage for employees of interstate retail or service establishments, enterprises, to increase the minimum wage under the Act to $1.15 an hour, and for other purposes."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Under the agreement heretofore entered, the time is now under the control of the minority leader and the majority leader. How much time does the Senator yield himself?

Mr. DIRKSEN. I yield myself 30 minutes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator is recognized for 30 minutes.

Mr. DIRKSEN. I had hoped that sometime during the course of the discussion on the bill there might be a brief historical package with respect to the Fair Labor Standards Act which was enacted 22 years ago. I was a Member of the House of Representatives when this subject came before Congress for consideration. The bill as it was finally enacted into law contained generally certain findings in policy, some definitions, and particularly a definition of the word "commerce," which in the original act read:

(6) The term "commerce" means trade, traffic, commerce, transportation, or communication among the several States, or between the District of Columbia or any Territory of the United States and any State or other Territory, or between any foreign country and any State, Territory, or the District of Columbia, or within the District of Columbia or any Territory, or between points in the same State but through any other State or any Territory or the District of Columbia or any foreign country.

It also contained provisions with respect to Puerto Rico and the Virgin Islands. It fixed the minimum wage, the maximum hours, and the provisions under which overtime must be paid. Then it included a list of exemptions, a provision for court review, and a provision on child labor.

I call attention to the provision on child labor in the original act for the very good reason that it expresses what we have always done with respect to the Wage and Hour Act.

We have been careful to protect its interstate character. In the original act we recited, with respect to child labor, that—

No producer, manufacturer, or dealer shall ship or deliver for shipment in commerce any goods produced in any establishment,

And so forth. I recall reasonably well the discussion that took place on the floor of the House of Representatives at that time. There was extended debate on the question of adequate exemptions so that the impact of the original act would not be too heavy and it would not result in bureaucratic control over those functions that are so essentially local and intrastate in character.

So in the original act we wrote exemptions for those in fields of executive occupations, administrative, professional, local retailing, fishing, farming, and related activities, small newspapers, streetcar and interurban employees, and those who operated small switchboards; and finally we inserted penalties, namely, fine and imprisonment and double indemnity for violation.

Twenty-two years ago in the original act the minimum wage was set at 25 cents. Since that time there have been a number of modifications of the Fair Labor Standards Act. We changed the minimum wage in October of 1945 to 40 cents. In January 1950, the Congress changed it to 75 cents. In March of 1956 it was changed to $1, where it stands at the present time.

The coverage of the Wage and Hour Act, according to the statistics furnished to the committee, embraces roughly 24 million workers, but actually, as I understand, only 5 percent of that number are really at the minimum wage level. That fact is recited in the report.

There are uncovered, according to the statistics of the Department of Labor, about 20 million people who are engaged in agriculture, in the retail business, and in service establishments. They include domestics, those engaged in construction work, and those engaged in some miscellaneous categories.

I point out that the States have not been remiss in this field, because today there are 29 States of the Union, as I understand, that have a minimum wage act.

Protests have been made on this floor that the States have not been sufficiently generous. That is not the fault of Congress. If someone feels that way, then he ought to go to the Governor of his own State and to his own legislature and lodge the protest there. He may carry on a crusade in the interest of improved wages and hours, if he so desires, but always within the framework of the State law.

The law also requires that the Secretary of Labor submit a report. In 1959 he submitted a report and suggested that there should be no increase in the minimum wage, but he did suggest a modest expanded coverage. In January, 1960, other messages came to the Congress requesting a modest increase in the minimum wage and also expanded coverage. It was in pursuance of that request, in part, and probably because of some self-generated interest, that a great many proposals were introduced, both in the House and in the Senate. In the Senate the first bill introduced was Senate bill 1046, which was introduced by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. KENNEDY], the Senator from Oregon [Mr. MORSE], and others. The administration bill was introduced by the distinguished Senator from Vermont [Mr. PROUTY] under the title S. 1967.

In the House of Representatives a bill, known as H.R. 4488, was introduced by Representative ROOSEVELT, of California. Still another bill was introduced by the Representative from New Jersey, Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. It was H.R. 7490. Then the distinguished Representative from Ohio introduced a rather streamlined bill, H.R. 12822. There were other bills introduced. Perhaps I should list them for the RECORD. They are: H.R. 188, 253, 317, 450, 1190, 1198, 2345, 4409, 4488, 4544, 4579, 4664, 4740, 5792, 5842, 6564, and 7291.

Those were the bills amending the Fair Labor Standards Act which were introduced in the House of Representatives.

Then there was H.R. 12823, introduced by Mr. KITCHIN.

The bill introduced by Representative ROOSEVELT was reported to the House on June 23. When the bill came to the floor, the House rejected it. The House adopted the Kitchin bill. That is a good name for a bill—the Kitchin bill. The House made one mistake, however. A Representative, probably in haste and in the heat and difficulties of the moment—and I know what that means when one operates under a 5-minute debate limitation in the House, and when one is trying to pull his thoughts together clearly to write out an amendment and get it done before the debate time expires—succeeded in having the House adopt an amendment which has been referred to in the press and elsewhere as a "blooper." I have never looked up the word "blooper." One day I must go to Webster and see if he can enlighten me on that point. In any event, what that amendment did, according to the best interpretations we could get, was to cut out 14 million of the 24 million already covered by the Wage and Hour Act.

It created an impossible situation, which must be cured.

Then activity began before the Senate Committee on Labor and Public Welfare. A number of bills were introduced. First there was the administration bill, which was introduced by the Senator from Vermont [Mr. PROUTY]. It provided for coverage of 2,505,000. That is an estimate. No wage increase was provided in that bill. This was the approach: It would cover those enterprises which were substantially engaged in commerce with goods inflowing—meaning flowing into the State to such enterprises—of $1 million annually, and such enterprises had to have 100 employees or more. That was the general administration approach.

Then came Senate bill 1046. That was introduced by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. KENNEDY] and other cosponsors. It provided a wage increase of up to $1.25 an hour. The coverage at that time was estimated at 7,500,000. The approach was, first, to change the definitions in the bill with respect to commerce, and the definitions carried in the bill are certainly very intriguing and very engaging:

"Activity affecting commerce" includes any activity, business, or industry in commerce or necessary to commerce or to the production of goods for, or the distribution of goods in, commerce.

One of the committee prints included the language "or which competes with goods in commerce."

I backed away from that in a hurry. We had a case in Illinois of a little dairy in the town of Wrightwood. It bought all its milk in the State. It never sold a pint of it beyond the State line. They tried to make applicable a marketing order. Finally the case went to the U.S. Court of Appeals. The court said that the dairy, which buys in Illinois exclusively and sells exclusively in our State, might compete with other milk in the stream of commerce. That is a great definition. It shows what happens to words we write in the enactment of legislation. So I made my statement and made my case in committee from time to time, and I stated that I simply could not reconcile myself to definitions of that kind.

Then the bill states:

"Enterprise engaged in an activity affecting commerce" means any of the following which is engaged in any activity affecting commerce:

(1) any such enterprise which has one or more retail or service establishments if the annual gross volume of sales of such enterprise is not less than one million dollars.

What is being done there is hanging the dollar sign on the commerce clause of the Constitution. It will no longer be a question of inflowing or outflowing. Does it do a million dollars' worth of business? Maybe it does it in one town. Putting the dollar sign on it means that a subsequent Congress can reduce the amount to $500,000, and then to $250,000. Ultimately, we will have shredded and desiccated the whole commerce clause of the Constitution. I cannot put that in my book, and I shall resist it the best I know how. Originally, it was $500,000, but under committee pressure it was raised to $1 million.

It can be seen how an atmosphere and background is created. If the $250,000 had done the job, perhaps they might have settled for $250,000.

I read further from the bill:

(2) any such enterprise which has one or more establishments engaged in laundering, cleaning, or repairing clothing or fabrics if the annual gross volume of sales of such enterprise is not less than $1,000,000.

I believe originally the amount was $250,000. In committee it was raised to $1 million. Unless a laundry is located in a town which is situated on a State line, I cannot imagine a laundry going out and foraging for its business all over a State. So far as I know, laundries serve a community.

Are we going to say that because an aggressive laundryman is able to build up a million-dollar business, he is going to be put under the commerce clause of the Constitution, and, as Thomas Jefferson once said, have his business directed from Washington, to be told when he shall sow, when he shall reap, when he shall wash clothes, when he shall dry them, when he shall have them laundered, when he shall iron them, and when he shall deliver them to some housewives?

All that is included in the Kennedy bill.

(3) any such enterprise which is engaged in the business of operating a street, suburban, or interurban electric railway, or local trolley, or motor bus carrier.

We used to have a little streetcar line in my town, when I was a city father. It never made much money. When I got a look at the books, at one time, I found it was a single entry bookkeeping system that was used, and no depreciation account was kept. Therefore, when the streetcars were worn out, there was no money, and the only thing that could be done was to go to the taxpayers to ask for money with which to buy new ones, unless one wanted to replace the trolleys with buses.

But this provision proposes to give it a local and a provincial character, and to let the long hand of Washington reach out into the communities and say whether they are under the commerce clause or not.

No. 4 is a dandy. It provides:

(4) any establishment, not included in an enterprise described in paragraph (1), (2), or (3) of this subsection, which has one or more employees engaged in commerce or in the production of goods for commerce if the annual gross volume of sales of such establishment is not less than $250,000 (or $350,000 in the case of an establishment engaged in the business of construction or reconstruction, or both).

"One or more." If a retail establishment has 250 people working, and two of them are engaged in interstate commerce, all of them come under the definition of "commerce" in the Kennedy bill.

What has been done in the bill has been to change completely the philosophy of the Wage and Hour Act. When it was written 22 years ago—and I was a part of that undertaking—we made it an undertaking between the employer and the employee. We said in the act, in so many words, that an employer shall pay to his employee. What does this provision do? This provision says, "any establishment." So we take all the employees en masse, if they qualify under the dollar sign variations of the interstate commerce clause.

It includes any gasoline service establishment if the gross annual sales are more than $250,000. That is a service establishment. The only exception which has been made in all these categories is if the enterprise is family owned—if the father, mother, and youngsters in the family own and operate it.

It can be understood why some of us felt so deeply about the bill in committee, and why amendments were offered, even though we were sometimes charged with wanting to bog the bill down. We are just as desirous of getting a bill as anybody else, but our difference of opinion with the proponents of the committee bill is in the approach; it is not in the objective. We want to go to the goals, all right, but we want to do it consonant with the commerce clause of the Constitution, and to make certain that centralized bureaucratic government will not be further expanded to the point where there will be an erasing of the State and local lines, so that everything will come within the purview of Uncle Sam.

In the early deliberations in the committee, we worked over three committee prints—print No. 1, print No. 2, and print No. 3. When we had print No. 3 before the committee, the coverage was estimated, not at 5 million, as in the pending bill, but at 10,700,000. Wages were set at $1.15 and then $1.25 for those now covered. To those not covered, in the first year it was set at $1; in the second year, $1.10; in the third year, $1.20; and then $1.25 thereafter.

Nothing is said about making an economic study; we simply put an escalation clause in the bill, regardless of the situation in the country, whether the economy is weak or strong. By legislative fiat, over a 4-year period, we say, "This is how the wage will go up." No pretense is made of having any economic background for that purpose.

The bill before us provides coverage of an estimated 5 million persons. The wage for those now covered will be $1.15 in the first year, then $1.20, and then $1.25. For those not now covered, it will be $1 the first year, then $1.05, then $1.15, and finally $1.25.

But the very idea of setting a precedent for raising wages 4 years from now, without having the slightest notion whether the economy will go up or will go down, or whether such an increase is justified, certainly has no appeal to me.

What are the defects in the bill? First, it completely shreds the commerce clause of the Constitution. That in itself is serious enough.

Second, it deals with establishments, not with people. It seeks to bring under the act all establishments, whether they employ one or more persons.

Third, it sets the wage rate for succeeding years by legislative fiat, without any economic finding.

I have heard the term "growthmanship" used. If ever there will be growthmanship, it will be found in the Federal Government if the Kennedy bill—the committee bill—ever goes on the statute books. It will take only a little while—a subsequent Congress or two—to modify it. Then the agencies and departments will reach out, and there will be growthmanship with a vengeance which will move us steadily along the path of more centralized power.

I go on the theory that that kind of bill will do real injury to small business; and when they have difficulty, what will be the ultimate result? Very simply, they will try to foreshorten their payrolls as best they can. That will add to the unemployment queue. There has been a similar impact whenever there have been other increases in the wage rate.

I am willing to increase the wage, even though I think it is a little hazardous to do so at the moment. However, I am not willing to set, for years ahead, the kind of wage that is proposed in the Kennedy bill, without knowing where I am going and what the economic justification for it is.

It could be that this is a new frontier. I would not know. I have always gone on the theory that a frontier has a line. It separates the known from the unknown. It separates the explored from the unexplored.

How avidly, as a youngster, I used to gobble up all those books in the library—"The Deerslayer," and that sort of thing, in which one read about the Indians and the pioneers out on the frontier.

So here we are talking about a new frontier. What is it? It is the frontier of the commerce clause pushed out of the way. Put a dollar sign on it, move it into new ground, and let us see where we go. I am pretty serious about this, because it gives me very deep concern. I have followed the activities of the distinguished chairman of the subcommittee. I have followed most of the discussions in the full committee, from time to time. Then I have read very carefully the opening statement of the distinguished junior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. KENNEDY]. Strangely enough, in the statement he presented to the Senate on August 10, he fairly disposed of the whole Federal-State relationship in one sentence, notwithstanding these fantastic definitions in the pending bill. He said:

> There is no merit to the argument that the bill changes the balance between State and Federal authority.

That is a dandy. But there is another statement here which intrigues me even more. The last sentence in Senator KENNEDY's statement to the Senate was this:

> The enactment of this bill is only one step.

That is not the minority leader talking. That is not a Republican talking. That is the Democratic presidential nominee talking from his own printed page.

> The enactment of this bill is only one step, but an essential step, forward, as we cross this frontier to grasp the high opportunities which face the Nation.

Mr. President, what would be the second step, and what would be the third step, as we look with hope and vigor and rededicated faith and consider how to cross that frontier line? What is it that lurks out there on the frontier, that will call upon this great legislative body to take the second step and then the third step, and to move irretrievably further on until it has weakened and impaired the Federal-State system, with all its sweetness, with all its delicacy, with all its balance, with all its beauty, and with all its conservation of freedom? After all, Mr. President, back home—not here in the Nation's Capital—is the laboratory of freedom and of sound government.

So, Mr. President, I become tremendously disturbed, not only about the first step, but also about the second step.

Mr. President, instead of the amazing definitions contained in the pending bill, a better approach is available to all this, and it is to be found in the amendment in the nature of a substitute which I offer. That measure was passed by the House, but included a tremendous error which we undertake to cure. It was House bill 12677. What does it do? First, it broadens the exemption for those engaged in processing shade-grown tobacco. Mr. President, I think I can say to my distinguished friend, the Senator from Connecticut, that in Connecticut the finest shade-grown tobacco is produced.

Mr. BUSH. The Senator from Illinois is correct.

Mr. DIRKSEN. I am not an expert in that field, and I hope I do not offend those who come from other tobacco-producing areas.

Question arose about bulking and rebulking in certain of those areas. So a provision to clarify that point was included.

Second, there is included a provision which sets the minimum wage at $1.15, instead of $1.25.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time the Senator from Illinois has yielded to himself has expired.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, I yield myself 10 additional minutes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Illinois is recognized for 10 more minutes.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Furthermore, Mr. President in our amendment in the nature of a substitute we leave out the very "interesting" definitions. Of course, definitions always intrigue me no end. But in our amendment in the nature of a substitute, we do not include any "funny" definitions. For instance, our amendment does not define "enterprise"; but according to the Kennedy bill:

> (r) "Enterprise" means the related activities performed (either through unified operation or common control) by any person or persons for a common business purpose, and includes all such activities whether performed in one or more establishments or by one or more corporate or other organizational units but shall not include the related activities performed for such enterprise by an independent contractor—

And so forth. Sometimes, Mr. President, I wonder how prolix we can get in the entire field of semantics.

Some years ago I read of a man who wished to give an orange to another man. He said, "Draw up the necessary legal language to accomplish my purpose." Mr. President, you should have seen the instrument of conveyance which was prepared: "I hereby convey all right, title, and interest in one undivided orange"—and thus he went on to describe it.

Mr. President, do we have to proceed in that way, by means of definitions in the bill; do we have to recite that " 'activity affecting commerce' includes any activity, business, or industry in commerce or necessary to commerce or to the production of goods for, or the distribution of goods in, commerce"?

It has been said that language has been borrowed from some other enactment. But Senators should examine the language used by Chief Justice Hughes, of the U.S. Supreme Court, with respect to what he regards as certain limitations, even when language of this kind was used. In that case, the Court was dealing with the provisions of the National Labor Relations Act; and in the Jones-Laughlin case, 301 U.S. 1, the Chief Justice of the Supreme Court said:

> This definition is one of exclusion, as well as inclusion. The grant of authority to the Board does not purport to extend to the relationship between all industrial employees and employers. Its terms do not impose collective bargaining upon all industry, regardless of effects upon interstate or foreign commerce. It purports to reach only what may be deemed to burden or obstruct that commerce, and thus qualified it must be construed as contemplating the exercise of control within constitutional bounds.

That puts the matter in an entirely different light.

It may be said by some, "We have simply taken similar language from a different statute." But Chief Justice Hughes, one of the greatest jurists in the history of our Republic, made it quite clear, in the Jones-Laughlin case, whether there are limitations.

So in our amendment in the nature of a substitute we leave out the definitions.

Mr. President, between 1,800,000 and approximately 2 million will be covered, we believe, by our amendment in the nature of a substitute. One cannot state the number exactly, for it is impossible to tell. One must make the best possible estimate from whatever facts and statistics are available.

But we now include and preserve the interstate character of the bill, by simply saying that every employer engaged in commerce or in the production of goods for commerce who has five or more retail or service establishments and who operates such establishments in two or more States will be covered.

And there is the commerce feature of it.

Frankly, I want to have a bill in this field passed. This one is substantially the bill which was passed by the House of Representatives, but with the necessary corrections, and with the inclusion of service establishments. We believe we should liberalize the coverage somewhat; and this measure will do so. We think this measure is, therefore, entirely equitable.

Mr. LAUSCHE. Mr. President, will the Senator from Illinois yield for a question?

Mr. DIRKSEN. Yes; I yield.

Mr. LAUSCHE. Will the Senator from Illinois explain why his amendment in the nature of a substitute calls, in lines 16, 17, and 18, for $1.15 an hour, but in line 1, on page 3, for $1 an hour?

Mr. DIRKSEN. Yes. The reason for it is very simple: There still are employers who do not pay the $1 minimum. It is necessary to give them an opportunity to adjust and to carry on and to integrate their businesses accordingly.

Insofar as the data from the Department of Labor are concerned, we discovered that the minimum wage has a very considerable impact. So there must be a little time—particularly in the case of those not now covered—to make that adjustment. That is the reason for considering two separate categories—namely, those now covered and those not now covered.

Mr. LAUSCHE. Those now covered would be benefited by the raise to $1.15, would they?

Mr. DIRKSEN. That is correct.

Mr. LAUSCHE. And in the case of those newly brought in, under the language about five or more retail or service establishments operating in two or more States, those workers would become the beneficiaries of the $1 minimum, would they?

Mr. DIRKSEN. That is correct.

Of course, in line with the debate I carried on a moment ago, I point out that there will be other Congresses, and they will have to examine the economic data. I think we are rather presumptuous if we undertake, by words written on a piece of paper to be inscribed in a lawbook, to say that in 3 or 4 years this, that, or the other thing will happen, and if we then attempt to prescribe how it shall be dealt with. Certainly we must deal with those things as we proceed.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. DIRKSEN. I yield.

Mr. CLARK. Do I correctly understand that with respect to employees covered in section 4(b), beginning on line 21 of page 2, where the rate is fixed at not less than $1 an hour, there is no subsequent increase provided in the pending amendment?

Mr. DIRKSEN. Yes. Future Congresses can deal with it. We try to protect them in that adjustment period, and then Congress can deal with it later.

Mr. LAUSCHE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. DIRKSEN. I yield.

Mr. LAUSCHE. Do I correctly understand that, under the amendment, there is no attempt to fix the definition of interstate commerce on the basis of $1 million worth of business, regardless of the nature of the operation?

Mr. DIRKSEN. Precisely so. We leave the definition of commerce that was in the original Fair Labor Standards Act stand precisely where it is, and we do not try to hang a dollar sign on it and say, "Well, if you do $1 million worth of business you are in commerce; if you do $999,999 worth of business, you are not in commerce."

Mr. LAUSCHE. There is a provision in the amendment about doing business in two or more States. The proposal apparently implies that if business is done in two or more States that brings it rather certainly within the meaning of what we understand interstate commerce to be. Is that correct?

Mr. DIRKSEN. Precisely so; and the definition carried in the original act fortifies that.

Mr. LAUSCHE. Under the bill that is pending before the Senate, it makes no difference if a person was selling poultry——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. JOHNSTON of South Carolina in the chair). The time of the Senator has expired.

Mr. DIRKSEN. I yield myself 10 additional minutes.

Mr. LAUSCHE. If a person in Ohio bred poultry and finally sold it, even though the poultry never crossed a State line, if he did $1 million worth of business, under the pending bill, he would be covered by the act?

Mr. DIRKSEN. The language of the bill speaks for itself:

"Enterprise engaged in an activity affecting commerce" means any of the following which is engaged in any activity affecting commerce:

(1) any such enterprise which has one or more retail or service establishments—

It does not say in two or more States—

if the annual gross volume of sales of such enterprise is not less than $1,000,000, exclusive of excise taxes at the retail level which are separately stated.

That makes it as clear as crystal.

Mr. LAUSCHE. I thank the Senator.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, that is the essence of it. We preserve pretty well the exemptions in existing law. We try to extend coverage to 1,800,000, or perhaps 2 million; and that is an estimate. We try to come up with a minimum wage, and not go beyond that point, and preserve the interstate character of this kind of legislation.

I have to add this one very realistic observation. I am anxious for a bill. We on this side of the aisle are anxious for a bill. We have not engaged either in a concerted or an individual effort to bog down or to obstruct, because if I had to answer it, and I would answer in all kindliness, we went back and examined the RECORD, and we discovered that 21,000 lines in the RECORD were utilized not on our side, but on the loyal opposition side, and 12,000 lines in the RECORD were utilized by Members on this side of the aisle.

Can it be said from that disclosure that we have engaged in unduly prolonged debate? Certainly not. And I have been willing right along to enter into any kind of a reasonable arrangement so long as the verities of the measure now before us become quite generally known to the Senate and we have a chance to speak our piece with respect to the substitute.

I venture one other observation, and then I shall yield to my friend from Connecticut [Mr. BUSH]. If we want a bill, we still have to go to conference. We have to go to the House. I will be on the conference committee, unless all signs fail, and the distinguished Senator from Arizona will be on the conference committee. I have been up against the House conferees a good many times. For 11 days, day after day, we sat in the old Supreme Court chamber on the Landrum-Griffin bill, and we finally hammered out something. But the House said, "We have given a lot of time to this matter and this is as far as we will go, and no farther."

That is not a threat. That is not an invitation. I just utter it because I think I am reasonably well acquainted with the legislative process.

So here is a bill that conforms substantially to the House pattern, deletes the error the House made, liberalizes it somewhat to expand the coverage, and preserves the $1.15 that the House wrote into the bill in the first instance.

Mr. President, does not that add up to the best chance to get a bill before this session concludes? If that is not reality and verity talking, then, of course, I know nothing about this legislative process after 27 years in the House and the Senate.

I yield to the distinguished Senator from Connecticut.

Mr. BUSH. Mr. President, I congratulate the Senator on a very able presentation of the amendment, which I shall support. I point out that, in my judgment, the proposal will permit Senators to vote for an amendment which complies with the Republican Party platform. While I do not attempt to interpret the Democratic Party platform for anybody else, it would certainly comply with it, in my judgment, so far as coverage is concerned.

The question I want to ask the Senator is this: One of the things that has concerned me most about the Kennedy bill has been the effect upon the small storekeeper, the retailer up and down Main Street, in the towns of my State and in towns all over the United States. Particularly, I want to ask the Senator if it is not true that, if the Kennedy bill passed, it would put a very heavy burden in reporting and record keeping on the part of small merchants who are not organized for this type of work, and would make compliance very difficult, or if the merchants were able to comply, it would make it quite expensive for the people who run small establishments?

I ask the Senator if that is a valid point.

Mr. DIRKSEN. It is a valid point, and I can add a postscript to it by saying that too often we forget the burdens we put on people in the form of paperwork and bookkeeping, in order to keep abreast of all the demands of a central government. We are becoming a veritable nation of bookkeepers, and, when it comes to small business, not only that, but it slows up business. Often we want to hike into a store, get an item, and rush out. A slip has to be made out; the sales tax has to be computed; this has to be done; that has to be done. It has to be sent up to a central office, and through a compressor. What in simpler days was a simple across-the-counter transaction now becomes a transaction really worthy of legal transactions.

Mr. BUSH. I am not familiar with the minimum wage laws in all of the States, but I imagine those States which have minimum wage laws already require some form of reporting and inspection, to make sure the laws are being complied with. This would not be satisfactory, if we had a Federal minimum wage law applying to these small institutions, these small stores and retail establishments. There would be another series of reports to the Federal Government by people who are ill equipped to report and who could ill afford to duplicate the results on an entirely different form. Of course there would be a different form required by the Federal Government.

I do not believe we should unnecessarily—and I think it is unnecessary—put this extra, heavy burden of reporting upon these small business establishments which have a hard time, as it is, taking care of their accounting and bookkeeping work.

Mr. DIRKSEN. I say to my friend from Connecticut, if there were no concern among the small business enterprises of the country they would not be in Washington in great numbers expressing their anxiety about the bill. They have had real anxiety. They have been coming to Washington for quite some time. That is the best answer I know. Normally they stay home. They go to church. Their children go to schools. They run their businesses. It is only when the shadow of fear falls athwart them in their own local enterprises that they spend money out of their own pockets, which sometimes they can ill afford to spend, and make a trek to Washington to importune their legislators and to say, "Please give ear to my complaint. I am a little guy. Here is the kind of business I have. Is this burden to be put upon me? What do I have to do to meet the shock of the burden?"

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator's additional time has expired.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, I yield myself 5 more minutes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Illinois is recognized for 5 more minutes.

Mr. DIRKSEN. The point the Senator has made is entirely valid.

Mr. BUSH. I thank the Senator.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, how much time remains?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator has 40 minutes remaining at the present time.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Forty minutes. Mr. President, I yield 5 minutes to the distinguished Senator from Colorado [Mr. ALLOTT].

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Colorado [Mr. ALLOTT] is recognized for 5 minutes.

Mr. ALLOTT. Mr. President, the subject of the proposed legislation is not new to me, since I served on the Committee on Labor and Public Welfare for 4 years, and it was during the time the previous minimum wage bill was enacted into law. At that time, as is true now, every effort which the human mind could conceive was made to break down the dual character of our Government.

I am going to support the pending amendment, and primarily for one reason. It is not that I do not believe in some areas we could stand an expansion of coverage or even a raise in the minimum wages. I shall support the amendment primarily upon the basis that the commerce clause of the Constitution was never intended to be distorted and warped out of its original context, as it would be in the original bill which was offered to the Senate.

I recall that in the Committee on Labor and Public Welfare there were amendments and even bills suggested which not only included the phrase "affecting commerce" but which used the phrase "businesses competing with those businesses which affect interstate commerce."

The pending bill does not go that far, but the original bill would have left out only the shoeshine boy, the barber, and perhaps two or three others. Those are about the only people I can think of who would not have been covered.

Mr. BENNETT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. ALLOTT. I am happy to yield.

Mr. BENNETT. If a barber used a pair of shears made in some other State, does the Senator think he would be left out?

Mr. ALLOTT. No; I do not. If he were competing with a barbershop in a railroad or airport terminal, which really was a group of barbershops all over the country, he certainly would be included.

The term "affecting commerce" as used in the National Labor Relations Act is defined. Section 2, subsection (7) defines "affecting commerce" as meaning, "in commerce, or burdening or obstructing commerce or the free flow of commerce, or having led or tending to lead to a labor dispute burdening or obstructing commerce or the free flow of commerce."

Even in this sense it is absolutely true that the lawmakers at that time did not intend to do anything with respect to labor relations except those which interfered with or obstructed the free flow of interstate commerce.

I cannot support the bill, because I simply do not believe that we can continue to put the Federal Government astride the backs of every man, woman, and child in this Nation. This is what we would do, because if we adopt the criteria in the bill we might as well set the figure at $500,000, as one of the bills set it, or at $250,000, or at $100,000, and bring every one of these businesses under the scope of the law.

I wish to make the record clear. There are many groceries, for example, which do a million-dollar gross business, which are locally owned.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time of the Senator from Colorado has expired.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, I yield the distinguished Senator 3 additional minutes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Colorado is recognized for 3 additional minutes.

Mr. ALLOTT. These stores are locally owned. The net profit of grocery stores runs from seven-tenths of 1 percent up to about 1½ percent. This means from a million-dollar business there is a net profit of $15,000 or less. How anyone can say that this is interstate commerce is beyond my understanding.

The same is true with respect to the automobile dealers, for example, who sell units at $1,500 or $2,000 or more. It does not take many sales to reach the point where there is a million-dollar business, yet the net profits in those cases often run around one and a half percent, or about $15,000 a year. This is the character of the business which is sought to be brought under the law.

If we desire to preserve the dual character of our Government—the Federal-State relationship—we have to begin somewhere. I am perfectly willing to vote for a bill, but I am not willing to vote for a bill which goes so far afield in rewriting the standards, so that it is based upon the establishment and the amount of total business done rather than on what is done and whether the enterprise is actually engaged in interstate commerce. It seems to me clear that for us to rewrite the provision, to take away the standard of what the individual employee is doing, as the standard has been in the past, and to base the law upon establishments regardless of whether or not they are actually operating in interstate commerce, would be a mistake Congress should not make. I certainly do not propose to join in making that error.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, may I respectfully suggest that perhaps the opposition to the substitute might wish to use some time.

Mr. MORSE. I should like to hear more in support of the amendment, if the Senator would like to offer more.

Mr. DIRKSEN. I must say to my esteemed and affable friend from Oregon, I made what I thought was a reasonable exposition, about 45 minutes long. I think we have consumed nearly two-thirds of our time. The opposition has 1½ hours on this matter. I thought perhaps the Senator would like to address himself to the substitute and let us hear his views on the subject.

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, I yield myself 10 minutes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Oregon is recognized.

Mr. MORSE. Unless there are other Senators who would like to speak on the amendment, I will recommend that we yield back our time and vote.

There is nothing new about the amendment. This is old straw with no seed in it at all. We have threshed it out for some days on the floor of the Senate. This is only another attempt to diminish the effectiveness of the committee bill, which came to the floor of the Senate, may I recall to Senators again, with only three dissents.

We really brought a remarkably bipartisan bill to the floor of the Senate. It had been subjected to long hearings in the Labor Committee. All points of view expressed by the Senator from Illinois were presented to the committee. The printed record of hearings is voluminous. It is on the desks of Senators. Senators will find in it that very careful consideration was given to the various forms of proposals made by the Senator from Illinois.

I understand that I hold in my hand the only available copy of the Dirksen proposal in the Senate Chamber. It is a slight rewrite of the Goldwater amendment that was offered in committee as a substitute, and was overwhelmingly defeated in committee.

The Senator from Illinois [Mr. DIRKSEN] in effect seeks now to bring under coverage certain service establishments as well as the retail establishments, including the automobile establishments.

We are all well aware of the lobbying activity that is going on in the outer precincts of the Senate these days. I have been in the Senate 16 years. When legislation is considered I have become accustomed to observe powerful lobby groups seeking to have Senators rewrite a bill on the floor of the Senate and to turn the Senate into a Committee of the Whole for the purpose of legislative draftsmanship on the floor of the Senate. That is what we are now experiencing.

So my remarks will be directed to the philosophy of the bill as the committee brought it to the Senate, because when the debate on the Fair Labor Standards Act is reduced to basic premises, the contest concerns economic philosophy.

I care not how those who want to undercut this bill, who want to deplete this bill, who want to turn it into an empty label entitled "Amendments to the Fair Labor Standards Act," clothe their amendments with language. Their objective is to remove from coverage many thousands of fellow Americans who today are not being paid a decent wage, who today are really victims in our economy of a situation which requires them to subsidize various establishments whose operators do not want to pay a minimum wage.

INJUSTICE OF EXEMPTIONS

I say that is socially unjust and economically indefensible. It results in many incongruities on the Main Streets of America. On one side of the street is an establishment engaged in commerce in which a minimum wage is paid and overtime requirements are met. On the other side of the street there may be a restaurant or a retail establishment that does not have to pay the minimum wage prescribed by the Fair Labor Standards Act as it is at present worded.

The majority of the committee members believe that something should be done about this social and economic injustice. That is what the contest is all about.

Senators should put themselves in the position of those employees. Does it make any difference when it comes to paying the medical bills, buying the groceries, or sending the youngsters to school, whether or not the breadwinner is working in an establishment now exempt from the Fair Labor Standards Act or working in one that is not exempt? I will tell the Senate what difference it makes. It makes a great difference whether or not he has the economic income that makes it possible to give his family the decent standard of living which it ought to enjoy.

I believe that we have reached an era in the development of our economy in which it is socially and economically unjust to be haggling and quibbling over whether or not a person who is working in an industry that affects interstate commerce should or should not be covered by the Fair Labor Standards Act.

FLORIDA HOTEL CASES

There are many cases that could be cited, but I wish to cite one which I think ought to be used as the symbol for the determination of whether or not we are to enlarge coverage of those engaged in interstate commerce.

I cite the Florida hotel cases—see Hotel Employees v. Sax Enterprises (358 U.S. 270); Hotel Employees v. Leedons (358 U.S. 99). Said the court:

> The State of Florida has no authority to enjoin * * * (the picketing) * * * (because this was) activity governed by the National Labor Relations Act.

In the Florida hotel case the argument was made, as we have heard several times on the floor of the Senate in recent days, that hotels should not be considered as being involved in interstate commerce.

Senators may remember that the Florida courts had issued injunctions in the hotel cases. Senators may also remember that the Florida Supreme Court had sustained those injunctions, and there was finally an appeal to the U.S. Supreme Court.

The U.S. Supreme Court held that hotels were involved in interstate commerce, and I believe rightly so. In my opinion, the Supreme Court should make the decision as to what is involved in interstate commerce. The decision should not be made on the floor of the Senate by adopting the very limited definition that the amendment of the Senator from Illinois would have us adopt.

We cannot pass an unconstitutional act and have it stand; and if the definition of interstate commerce which the committee has brought before the Senate cannot be reconciled with the commerce clause of the Constitution, Senators who are opposed to us have nothing to worry about. The Supreme Court will throw it out.

But I do not believe that is their real concern. In my judgment, the probabilities are overwhelming that the Supreme Court will declare the definition contained in the bill brought to the floor of the Senate is within the Constitution, and the bill which we seek to have the Congress enact will meet the constitutional test if passed. This legal point should not be forgotten in the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. JOHNSTON of South Carolina in the chair). The time of the Senator has expired.

Mr. MORSE. I yield myself another 10 minutes. I have become very much interested in the development of this argument, on the invitation of the Senator from Illinois.

We must not forget that if the provisions of the pending bill involving the exercise of Federal power cannot be reconciled with the interstate commerce clause of the Constitution, the Supreme Court will throw out the law. I think they can be, and so do a majority of the members of the Senate Labor Committee.

But as I listened to the debate, I formed the impression that the opponents seem to be of the opinion that there is no remedy if, in fact, the Committee on Labor and Public Welfare has inserted into the bill a definition which will not stand the test of the U.S. Supreme Court—see Vulcan Forging (188 F. 2d 927).

Let us not forget that the lobbyists outside this precinct will, if we pass the bill, try to do everything they can to upset the act. That is their right and their prerogative, and, in fact, their obligation. But I am quite satisfied that the bill as brought to the Senate will stand the test of constitutional argument before the U.S. Supreme Court.

QUESTION OF PUBLIC POLICY

Arguing from that premise, I come to the question of what is socially and economically just to the workers involved.

As every member of the committee knows, it is my position that if a business can be deemed to fall under the prerogatives of the interstate commerce clause of the Constitution, then the workers, as a matter of social and economic justice, should be covered by the Fair Labor Standards Act.

That is why I argued against all exemptions, although the committee turned me down. I am against all exemptions in the American economy for workers who in fact work in a business or perform a service or are engaged in industry and who can be constitutionally covered under the interstate commerce clause by a fair labor standards act. I go all the way, because I have a deep faith and confidence in the strength of the free enterprise system.

The free enterprise system does not mean that an employer shall be permitted to exploit workers. The free enterprise system carries along with it a great moral responsibility on the part of employers to conform to the payment of decent wages. I believe that under the regulatory powers of the Government, under the police powers of the Federal Government, there is a duty resting upon the Government to see to it that employers do not take unfair advantage of the economically weak.

We are constantly confronted with this great contest in our economy, this contest between the economically strong and the economically weak. If we do not check the economically strong, human frailties being what they are, and human selfishness being what it is, the economically strong will take advantage of the economically weak.

That is what we see in America today—and it is a very ugly picture—in service trades, in hotels, in many retail establishments—the very groups that we seek to bring under coverage in the bill.

We have a great issue before us. It is whether, as a free people, we will say to our representatives in Congress and to our representative in the White House: "You have a moral duty to bring to an end the unfair discrimination which exists now under the Fair Labor Practices Act, as it is presently written on the books, with the exemptions it contains."

Therefore, I am against decreasing the exemptions in the bill the committee has brought to the Senate. In fact, I proposed in committee enlarging the coverage, rather than decreasing it.

I take that position because it is nothing more than a matter of plain justice. Employers who claim they cannot do this, that they cannot operate and pay the minimum wage provided in the bill which has been brought to the Senate, ought to work for wages themselves. I know how much criticism I will take for that statement of my social, political, and economic philosophy. I feel it very deeply. We should not recognize any economic right to take advantage of workers merely because they are engaged in a certain type of industry.

We had an interesting time a while ago when the minimum wage bill was being considered in committee. My efforts to bring under coverage a good many thousand workers which the statistics presented by the Department of Labor to the Committee on Labor and Public Welfare showed were getting from 53 cents to 60 cents an hour were beaten in committee. I have a great deal of respect for my colleagues who were unwilling to go as far as I thought we ought to go. I thought those workers ought to be brought under coverage, because when the issue got to the courts, the courts would find that the covering of them by Congress fell within the rights of Congress under the commerce clause of the Constitution.

DIRE PREDICTIONS HAVE NOT COME TRUE

When the committee overruled my view, I introduced a bill on the floor of the Senate which proposed that the salaries of all Members of Congress and of all employees of Congress be reduced to 53 cents an hour. It did not make sense to me to argue that exploited workers should not be covered because they work in laundries, or bus stations, or hotels, and that we would put those businesses out of business. I deny that they would go out of business.

If we go back in the legislative history on every piece of social welfare legislation in the field of labor economics for years, we find that the weeping cry has always been made for these poor businessmen, whom it is claimed we would put out of business if we required them to pay, under the interstate commerce powers of the Federal Government, a fair minimum wage.

History shows that such dire predictions have been untrue. When it was suggested that the minimum wage be raised to 40 cents an hour, arguments were made to lead us to believe that the economy was about to collapse. When it was decided to go up to 75 cents an hour, the argument again was, "You are going to ruin business. The economy cannot stand it." When it was decided to raise the minimum to $1 an hour, the same bewhiskered argument was made then.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time of the Senator from Oregon has expired.

Mr. MORSE. I yield myself 5 more minutes.

The predictions did not come true. It is my prediction today that if we include in the coverage the service trade employees, those businesses will keep right on operating. Why? Because of the basic strength of our free enterprise system.

So, as I say to the businessmen of my State, when I argue in the Senate for a higher minimum wage, I am arguing to help to protect the cash registers on the Main Streets of the cities of Oregon and of the Nation.

Why do I say that? When the unemployment insurance legislation was before the Senate, at first the business fraternity generally was against it. Now go before a chamber of commerce or a convention of businessmen and listen to the response if an argument were made for the repeal of unemployment insurance. The business interests of the country have come to recognize that unemployment insurance helps to maintain the purchasing power of the people living in a community who support the cash registers of the retail establishments of the Main Streets of the towns of America.

The same argument was made when the social security legislation was proposed. Oh, what a dire economic effect it would have on the economy of the Nation. Now businessman after businessman has come to recognize that the social security system is one of the checks against depressions. It has helped to stabilize purchasing power. It is necessary to have minimum purchasing power, too, in this country, in order to prevent "for lease" and "for sale" signs being placed in the store fronts of America.

The same is true of the original Fair Labor Standards Act. The argument was made that it would put enterprises out of business. Now we hear the plea again: A great injustice will be done to the businessmen of the country.

Again, I have greater faith in our economy than that. I am satisfied that this is the kind of legislation which will strengthen the purchasing power of hundreds of thousands of people. That, in turn, will strengthen the cash registers of the retail establishments of America.

SUBSIDY TO BUSINESS SHOULD BE PAID BY ALL

So, I shall not sit in the Senate and vote to deny coverage to people who can be covered under the interstate commerce clause on the basis of the argument that the employers cannot pay the wage. I do not think we have any right to ask those workers to subsidize those employers, by working for less than a decent minimum wage.

But if my friends of the opposition really are so concerned about the effect the bill may have on business, if they really believe that some businesses cannot remain in operation, I offer today the same proposal I offered in the Committee on Labor and Public Welfare when a similar argument was made there. If we believe it is important that a certain business should stay in operation, but cannot do so and still pay a minimum wage, then I take the position that, morally, Congress ought to provide tax relief which will help such an employer, so that all the taxpayers of the United States will subsidize that employer, rather than his workers.

So, in the Committee on Labor and Public Welfare I offered to join in the sponsorship of any bill which any Senator who made that argument wanted to offer, a bill which would set up an appropriate tribunal or committee or agency, to make findings of fact, just as in the early days of the Fair Labor Standards Act there were the so-called industrial committees under the wage and hour law.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time of the Senator from Oregon has expired.

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, I yield myself 5 more minutes.

WAGE TRIBUNAL PROCEDURE

Those tribunals consisted of representatives of the employers, representatives of the workers, and representatives of the public. They took evidence on the question whether or not a particular industry could raise its minimum wage to 40 cents. As the bill was originally drafted, the 40-cent wage was the minimum which would have to be paid, unless there was a finding that that wage would irreparably injure a particular business.

I served as chairman of one of those nationwide industry committees and as a member of another one. I listened then to the old, old argument that certain industries could not come up to the 40-cent-an-hour wage. Both committees on which I served, after taking the evidence, raised the minimum wage to 40 cents an hour.

In one instance, we did so by a unanimous vote of the committee, including the employer members; in the other instance, with one of the employer members dissenting, and the others voting with us. Subsequently, it was shown that those businesses were not, in fact, injured at all.

But I am willing, on the so-called tax proposal, to have a committee created which will find the answer to the question of fact: Can this particular business actually pay the minimum wage called for by the bill which the committee has reported to the Senate, and pay the overtime rate called for by the bill? If the committee should find that a business cannot pay the wage, then, and then only, that employer would be eligible for tax relief. He would be granted the tax relief if there were then an affirmative finding on a second question of fact, namely, Is it essential to the economy of the area that the particular business continue in operation?

Oh, it sounds cold; nevertheless, it is a reality. There are some businesses which are so marginal or inefficiently operated that it would be better for the economy if they did not continue in operation. Certainly, such a business should not receive a premium from the Federal Government for its inefficiency or marginal operations. In essence, that is what happens when such a business is taken out from under the coverage of the minimum wage bill.

If it is found that it is essential to the economy of the area in which such businesses are located that they remain in business, then I would give them relief from Federal taxes to the amount of money which would make up the difference between the amount which the wage committee finds they are capable of paying, and the minimum wage.

If such a law were on the books, it would be sparingly used, because there would be surprisingly few instances in which those findings of fact would be made by the investigating committee to favor the employer's position in a case.

DISCRIMINATION OF DIRKSEN PROPOSAL

The last point I want to make is that the Senator from Illinois has offered a very interesting amendment. He seeks to apply coverage to chain establishment operations. A great mercantile establishment can be located in one State, doing much more business than a chain operation such as, we will say, a small shoestore chain, operating one store in each of five States.

The small shoe chain operation would be covered, but the one great, large establishment in one State, doing five times as much business as the five stores located in five different States, would not. Is that fair? Can that kind of discrimination be justified? The difficulty is that when we try to draw artificial lines of exemption within the sphere of interstate commerce, we create one injustice after another. That is why I said pure justice calls for the elimination of exemptions entirely.

I think the Committee on Labor and Public Welfare went further than desirable in making the concession it made. It made most of the concessions, as the chairman of the committee knows, without my vote. But I voted to report the bill to the Senate because it contained some improvements. I do not believe we can justify, for the reasons I have set forth, any further reduction in the coverage of the bill.

Mr. President, this is not a question of putting the Federal Government "on the back" of every man, woman, and child in the Nation. The question is whether the Federal Government will assume what I regard as its clear duty under the commerce clause of the Constitution and will see to it that justice is done in connection with the interstate commerce rights of workers in establishments which the Supreme Court has found, and I am satisfied will continue to find, fall within the commerce clause of the Constitution.

We have before us questions of economic and social justice due to many thousands of workers who, at the present time, because the Federal Government has not assumed to moral obligation, are in fact being exploited by employers who do not want to pay a decent minimum wage.

I certainly feel that we can do no less than what the committee bill calls for. As we go forth to battle on the political platforms, between now and election day, we should go forth with a nonpartisan record on this issue. We should join hands and should clasp hands, and both Democrats and Republicans should join in saying to the American people, "When a really critical issue faces the Republic, we cease being Republicans or Democrats; on such issues we are nonpartisan."

Mr. President, this issue calls for nonpartisan action by the Congress to see to it that the thousands of workers covered by the bill which we have brought to the Senate remain covered, by defeating the Dirksen amendment.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, I yield myself 10 minutes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Illinois is recognized for 10 minutes.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, I think the beatniks have an expression "go for broke." That means, in the vernacular, "shooting the wad" or "going the whole hog."

I say to my friend, the Senator from Oregon, that he does not hesitate to "go the whole hog" to completely eviscerate the commerce clause of the Constitution, because he wants all workers to be covered by this measure. If he were as eloquent before the Legislature of the great Commonwealth of Oregon, he could get everything done in that State that he would desire. And if I did the same thing in Illinois, and if our colleague did the same thing in the State of Arizona, we still would preserve the Federal-State relationship without breaking down the Constitution of the United States and going all the way to the end of the road, as my distinguished friend the Senator from Oregon would do.

The Senator from Oregon is always very meticulous, and I have the utmost respect for every factual statement he makes. However, I must correct him on one point. He said this substitute was not offered in the committee. That is exactly correct; but what was failed to be said was that the committee bill was reported on June 27, and the House did not take any action on this substitute until June 30.

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, will the Senator from Illinois yield to me—in my time, if necessary?

Mr. DIRKSEN. I yield.

Mr. MORSE. I certainly did not mean to give the impression that the substance of the amendment of the Senator from Illinois was not discussed in the committee. It is true that the amendment in its present form was not submitted in the committee; but in the committee the Senator from Illinois made very able arguments in support of the thesis he is advocating in connection with this bill; and I did not mean to say that we were taken by surprise by the amendment in this form. We were not. We discussed the thesis of the amendment of the Senator from Illinois, as we did the thesis of the amendment of the Senator from Arizona [Mr. GOLDWATER], of which the amendment of the Senator from Illinois is a rewrite; and we rejected it.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, I agree with the distinguished Senator that nearly every facet of this matter was discussed. But this proposal was not offered there, for the very good reason that it was not then in being. The House of Representatives had not acted then; it did not act until 3 days after the Kennedy bill was reported from the Committee on Labor and Public Welfare.

I am afraid that at times I, myself, have indulged in the use of the question, during debate here on the floor, "Why was not the amendment offered in the committee? Why was not the substitute submitted to the committee?" Let me say that the reason why my amendment was not offered there was that the House had not then acted. But in my general discussion I have made it abundantly clear that this amendment is the House bill in liberalized form, with the errors deleted; and I believe this amendment is something we can consummate before this session ends.

My distinguished friend has said that if there are marginal businesses which cannot pay the minimum wage he advocates, perhaps they should go out of business and we should subsidize them.

I remember when a delegation came to my office, some time last year, from the CIO, and we had quite a discussion. They wanted the little switchboard operators in the rural areas of the country included. The argument became rather testy. Finally the spokesman for the group said:

> Well by God—

That was the language he used—

> if they can't pay it, they shouldn't be in business.

I said to him:

> Mister, have you ever lived in a remote rural area and seen one of the children in the family develop, at midnight, membranous croup; and the doctor was 10 miles away, and you had to get him on the telephone without a moment's delay?

That was the end of the argument, and they did not "make any hay" with me.

So we have exempted such workers from the application of our amendment.

In Chicago there is a little business that is operated entirely by paraplegics, boys who have lost the use of their legs. They are making electronics parts, and they are having a rough go of it. So far as I know, none of the electronics parts they are producing are sold outside of the Chicago area. But they would be covered by the Kennedy bill, when court interpretations were made of its rather tricky—and I use that word advisedly—definitions, for they are tricky definitions; and I would like to see the day when they were interpreted from on high by some judicial tribunal.

I have seen it happen before. One case involved charwomen who were working in a building on Chestnut Street, in Philadelphia. In the building, textile and clothing items for interstate commerce were manufactured. When the case went to the district court, and then to the Circuit Court for the Third Circuit, as I recall, it was held that because parts of the building were devoted to interstate commerce, the janitors and the charwomen came under the Fair Labor Standards Act.

I would rather go to Springfield, Ill., to my State capital, and make the argument there, rather than build up the centralized power under this great dome in Washington, so remote from the people. I want to have the laws developed on the basis of the laboratory experience of government at the local level.

The paraplegics to whom I referred a moment ago are operating a marginal business. Would it not be a great nourishment to their pride if they were told, "We are going to subsidize you. We are not going to impose this burden on you. Instead, we are going to subsidize you, so you can stay in business."

Mr. President, in this country there are many little businesses.

I have been engaged in little business. I got my first business start operating a grocery store between the sessions of college; and it was a rough go, too. I used to operate an ice cream parlor. I know how it is necessary to watch the pennies and the nickels. All that is nothing new in my family, and it is nothing new in my experience.

This is not a case of saving a businessman. Instead, it is a case of saving a job for someone who works in that business, for if the load is too heavy, then we shall see a repetition of what occurred in other days, because the records of the Department of Labor show what the impact has been. For if the load is too heavy, then we will follow the experience we had in other days, because the records in the Labor Department show what the impact has been.

Now, Mr. President, I think I am in good company so far as my views are concerned, because I have to go back a little. It is wonderful to draw upon legislative history that comes within the compass of one's own experience; but when this bill was up in the Congress in 1938—and I was over at the other end of the Capitol, serving my third or fourth term in the House—Franklin Roosevelt was the President then, and what did he say when he messaged the Congress about this bill? He said:

> There are many—
> Let me repeat—
> There are many purely local pursuits and services which no Federal legislation can effectively cover.

That is not the Republican leader of the U.S. Senate speaking in 1960. That is Franklin Roosevelt speaking in 1938.

Who handled the bill in the U.S. Senate at the time? The very distinguished Senator from Alabama who graces the Supreme Court of the United States today. He was the chairman of the committee of this body when this bill was handled. His name is Hugo Black. What did he say? He said:

> Businesses of a purely local type which serve a particular local community and which do not send their products into the stream of interstate commerce can better be regulated by the laws of the communities in which the business units operate.

That is not the Republican leader of the Senate talking in 1960. That is the very Honorable Hugo Black, Associate Justice of the Supreme Court of the United States, speaking, when he was a Member of this body and handling the Fair Labor Standards Act in 1938.

So, Mr. President, I feel that I am in pretty good company on this whole question.

My distinguished friend mentioned the lobbyists who are around. It is so easy to talk about them. But, Mr. President, there are other lobbies besides business lobbies, and I want the RECORD to show now that an indirect message came to me from those who represent organized labor, expressing the hope that the substitute would not be adopted. They did not come to me directly, although I have had quite a bit of experience with that. The corridors were so congested with labor lobbyists, when we sat for 11 days in the old Supreme Court Chamber on the Landrum-Griffin bill, that one could not get through.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time of the Senator has expired.

Mr. DIRKSEN. I yield myself 5 additional minutes.

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. DIRKSEN. I yield with pleasure.

Mr. MORSE. I hope the Senator from Illinois does not think I excluded labor lobbies. I disagree with them for concessions they have already made on the minimum wage bill and on one or two they apparently are willing to make. I happen to think that a labor leader who occupies the position he does should not be a party to compromising and eliminating from the bill parts that should be covered.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, in my humble country way, I make the record. I do not try to unnecessarily embarrass anybody. I do not unnecessarily mention names on the Senate floor and subject them to scorn and ridicule. I know what I know, and that I know. It is that simple.

So, Mr. President, there is not any point in my carrying on this discussion any longer. The substitute is here. It is very simple. In my judgment, it will be that or nothing.

I would rather go to the House with something that closely approximates what they have already taken action on. The clock is running out. The calendar is running out. There are not many days left before this resumed session will close its tent like Abou Ben Adhem and silently makes its way into the political deserts of this country——

Mr. MORSE. Steals away.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Steals away. That is right. It shows how inept I am in this land of romance and poetry; but "steals" away is the word.

Time is running out, but when we get through we must go to conference. There will be some rugged conferees sitting on the other side of the table. Then this measure must go to the White House for the President's approval. And may I guard, with every fiber of strength in my being, any statement I might make that the President might or might not veto the bill. I do not know; and I want to say, to the everlasting glory of President Eisenhower, close as I have been to him, and long as I have carried the standard for him, that never, never in advance has he ever intimated to me whether he would approve or disapprove a bill until his signature had or had not been affixed to the message. But I do know this, and my distinguished friend from Oregon knows it; he knows what it is to have these rugged House Members on the other side of the table. They just set their feet and say, "This is as far as it goes." And they are fundamentalists.

When I was a Member of the House I thought the Senate was prepared to destroy the country and that the only hope for this Republic and constitutional government was at the other end of this body. Then I graduated and came over here, and I want to feel that here reposes the last best hope of a citizenry dedicated to freedom and to the proper place of the Federal Government in the Federal-State relationship.

I can understand my distinguished friend from Oregon. He wants to go all the way—whole hog. That is it. Brush out the commerce clause of the Constitution. Even when we were discussing homeworkers, he had qualms, he had compunctions, he had deep and writhing anxiety about even those people, working in homes, making Christmas tree ornaments, because maybe they were outside the stream of commerce.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time of the Senator has expired.

Mr. DIRKSEN. I yield myself 1 minute.

So I have waited all these days, as a member of the committee, to get in a word on this bill. This substitute represents my convictions. It has been my conviction ever since I can remember. I have an abiding respect for the commerce clause. I have an abiding respect for the whole Federal-State relationship. But if the Federal power is built up continuously, the States must necessarily suffer, and there will be an erosion of the rights and privileges and responsibilities they enjoy.

When that great document was formulated, the representatives delegated powers to the Central Government, and that is all the power they granted. That is what the people's representatives at the constitutional convention gave us. They made it pretty specific. When that was over, they wrote another great residual clause in that document and they said, "The powers not delegated are reserved to the States."

Before I ever lay a profane hand upon and try to desecrate the commerce clause of the Constitution I shall wish to go back home and to ask the people of my own great commonwealth whether that is to their liking and whether they approve.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time of the Senator has expired.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, I yield myself 1 additional minute.

When we come to that day, Mr. President, we shall certainly in due course go further than that, as I indicated. This, of course, I must emphasize to my distinguished friend from Oregon. I love that word "Oregon," with its rounded sound.

Mr. MORSE. It is beautiful.

Mr. DIRKSEN. I used to refer to my distinguished friend WAYNE MORSE from the great Irish State of O'Regon. People always thought that was rather amusing. [Laughter.] I thought it was amusing.

Mr. President, I must remind my friend that the distinguished chairman of the subcommittee opened the debate on this subject with a prepared statement. I went through it late at night. That is about the only time one can get any work done, without the telephone jangling in his ear. I went over it. I read it and I reread it. I was so filled with trepidation that it disturbed my slumber and made me a restive and fitful person all night.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time of the Senator has expired.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, I yield myself 2 additional minutes, because I must now refresh my friend, in case he was not present.

This is what the distinguished Senator from Massachusetts said in his opening statement on the bill. He disposed of the whole Federal-State relationship in one sentence. I wish I had the capacity, Mr. President, to make the grandiloquent flourish, to accompany it with three or four words, and to say, "You are cast into outer darkness; you have no validity."

This is what he said with respect to the Federal-State relationship:

> There is no merit to the argument that the bill changes the balance between State and Federal authority.

Mr. President, if I had the capacity to dispose of that great and engaging challenge on the firmament of America, I think I would ask the President to appoint me to the Supreme Court of the United States. I would write the shortest opinions of any Justice who ever sat there. I would simply wave these problems away with a few flourishes of language.

The Senator said something else which to me was tremendously emphatic. I shall read it to my distinguished and affable friend from Oregon. These are not the words of the minority leader. These are the words of the distinguished Senator from Massachusetts as he addressed the U.S. Senate on the 10th day of August, in the evening. He said:

> The enactment of this bill is only one step—

I want this to sink in.

> The enactment of this bill is only one step, but an essential step, forward, as we cross this frontier to grasp the high opportunities which face the Nation.

We shall hear a great deal about that frontier business. [Laughter.]

So this is only one step. I always associate a frontier with wood, because, after all, the pioneers had to build log cabins. They had no nails, so they used wooden pegs and dowels.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time of the Senator from Illinois has again expired.

Mr. DIRKSEN. I yield myself 2 additional minutes.

They used wooden pegs and dowels. They had no glass, so they used oiled paper. They had quite a time of it. It was a sort of wooden age.

When I saw the distinguished chairman of the Democratic Convention in Los Angeles beating that old gavel, I knew what had happened, because the splinters flew in all directions—they even got into the platform [laughter], and they got into the new frontier.

So this is but one step as we move to the new frontier; from the known to the unknown, from the explored to the unexplored, from the found to the unfound. It is a great business. But when I take that step, I say to my friend, no matter how long or how short the step may be, I hope that my actions will always be compatible with the clauses in the Constitution of the United States vouchsafed to us by sacrifice, rounded out in fire, and tested by human experience in all its complexities over a long period of time.

Earnestly do I entreat the Senator to find now the errors of his ways and to not persist in them, but to support the substitute as something we can get, something on which we can deal with the House conferees, something for which we are certain to get approval by the President.

Then, like Abou Ben Adhem, when we march into the political desert to charm the voters back home the Senator and I can shake hands and say, "Out of the affability and out of the great understanding we finally got a bill."

So I adjure the Senator, in the language of Solomon. Was it not he who pleaded with the Lord for understanding? The Lord said, "Ask what I shall give thee." And Solomon said, "Give therefore thy servant an understanding heart."

Have an understanding heart. [Laughter.]

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, I yield myself 5 minutes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Oregon is recognized for 5 minutes.

Mr. MORSE. I wish to express from the depth of my heart my appreciation to the minority leader for the great campaign speech he has made in behalf of the Democratic nominee. In quoting from the very able and brilliant speech the Democratic nominee made in support of the committee bill, he pointed out, in effect, that he is a man of vision, a man who proposes we go forward and not backward. Our nominee is a man who rightly gave notice that this is the next step in this whole matter of the fair labor standards in our country.

The obligation of the Congress will never be kept and fulfilled, Mr. President, until we bring under the Fair Labor Standards Act all those who are entitled to protection under the commerce clause of the Constitution.

That is all the Senator from Massachusetts, in effect, promised to do by his speech. That is one reason why I think he is well qualified for the great office he seeks.

My friend from Illinois quoted from the statement which Justice Hugo Black made when he was a U.S. Senator. First, I point out that it was an irrelevant statement for him to cite, because it has no bearing upon the specifics of the proposed legislation before us.

But let us consider the principle which the quotation from Hugo Black sought to set forth.

It is one thing to sit in the Senate and look at a piece of proposed legislation but it is another thing to don the black robes of a U.S. Supreme Court Justice and sit in judgment, on that high tribunal, on the evidence presented in a case, and apply the principles of the Constitution to a given law and a given case.

In that latter capacity, Mr. Justice Hugo Black in decision after decision has found that workers who, it had been argued, were not covered under the commerce clause of the Constitution are in fact covered. So I say to my friend from Illinois that I am perfectly willing to leave the future and the destiny of our committee bill to the U.S. Supreme Court for decision, and I am satisfied that the finding will be that we have passed a constitutional bill.

The Senator from Illinois [Mr. DIRKSEN] argued again with respect to the delegation of authority under our Federal Constitution. The question is whether or not this power has been delegated to Congress by the Constitution. Those of us who support the bill say that it has been, and we are willing to test our position by passing the bill and taking it to the U.S. Supreme Court.

If power has been delegated under the commerce clause, then I am opposed to any discriminatory exercise of it.

It is as simple as that. I say that it is discriminatory to deny full protection of the commerce clause to workers in this country. It is unfair to say to one group of workers, "You shall have protection," and to another group of workers, "Pressures and expediencies being what they are, we are going to deny similar protection to you."

The Senator from Illinois quoted from a statement of the great Franklin Roosevelt in 1938, when the Fair Labor Standards Act was passed for the first time. As the clock above the desk of the Presiding Officer continues to move, as time passes, much time has passed since 1938, and during that passage of time many dynamic changes in the economy of this country have occurred.

Our economy has so changed that it is inconceivable that what might easily have been intrastate commerce in 1938 is now interstate commerce, because of the great changes in the operation of our economy itself.

Therefore it is not surprising to find that, after all, the concept of the commerce clause has been interpreted by the U.S. Supreme Court in that intervening time as a dynamic, changing concept, not as a dead letter of the law.

Therefore I turn to a series of cases which I think bear very definitely upon this constitutional legal issue which has been raised by the Senator from Illinois.

Let us turn to the decision of Mr. Chief Justice Warren in the case of Meatcutters v. Fairlawn Markets, 353 U.S., page 22. I shall not read the entire decision, although it is very brief. However, I ask unanimous consent to have the entire decision printed in the RECORD at this point of my remarks.

There being no objection, the decision was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

AMALGAMATED MEAT CUTTERS AND BUTCHER WORKMEN OF NORTH AMERICA, LOCAL NO. 427, AFL, ET AL., PETITIONERS v. FAIRLAWN MEATS, INC., NO. 41

(Argued Jan. 16, 1957—Decided Mar. 25, 1957)

Action by employer for an injunction against picketing of its premises. The court of appeals (99 Ohio App. 517, 135 N.E. 2d 689) held that union's picketing was unlawful according to Ohio policy, and continued in effect injunction granted by court of common pleas, and union appealed. The Ohio Supreme Court (164 Ohio St. 285, 130 N.E. 2d 237) dismissed appeal and union brought certiorari. The Supreme Court, Mr. Chief Justice Warren, held that effort by union not representing a majority of employer's employees to compel employer to agree to a union shop contract, was conduct of which the National Labor Relations Act had taken hold, and therefore, in the absence of a cession agreement between National Labor Relations Board and a State agency in accordance with statute empowering National Board to cede its jurisdiction over unfair labor practices affecting commerce to a State agency, State could not afford a remedy parallel to that provided by the National Act, and State courts were without jurisdiction to do so.

Vacated and remanded.

1. LABOR RELATIONS ⇐60

Interstate purchases of slightly more than $100,000 out of total purchases of not quite $900,000 per year by employer operating certain retail meat markets, were not so negligible that employer's business could not be said to affect interstate commerce within meaning of section of National Labor Relations Act defining term "affecting commerce." National Labor Relations Act (sec. 2(7), 29 U.S.C.A. 152(7)).

See publication "Words and Phrases," for other judicial constructions and definitions of "Affecting Commerce."

Where an employer's interstate activity consisted of purchases of slightly more than $100,000 worth of merchandise out of total annual purchases of not quite $900,000, and all of employer's sales were intrastate, Supreme Court would assume that National Labor Relations Board would decline jurisdiction, in view of fact that Board's current standards for asserting jurisdiction over retail stores called for annual direct imports from out of State of $1 million or indirect imports of $2 million.

Portion of statute empowering National Labor Relations Board to cede its jurisdiction over unfair labor practices affecting commerce to a State agency, operates to exclude State courts from disputes within National Board's jurisdiction in the absence of a cession agreement, as well as operating to exclude State labor boards from such disputes. National Labor Relations Act (sec. 10(a) as amended 29 U.S.C.A., sec. 160(a)).

See publication Words and Phrases for other judicial constructions and definitions of "State Agency."

4. LABOR RELATIONS ⇐510

Effort by union not representing majority of employer's employees to compel employer to agree to union shop contract was conduct of which the National Labor Relations Act had taken hold, and therefore, in the absence of cession agreement between National Board and a State agency in accordance with statute empowering National Board to cede its jurisdiction over unfair labor practices affecting commerce to a State agency, State could not afford a remedy parallel to that provided by the National act and State courts were without jurisdiction to do so. National Labor Relations Act (secs. 8(b)(2), 10(a) as amended 29 U.S.C.A. secs. 158(b)(2), 160(a)).

Power to determine whether State action should be permitted within an area of commerce which National Labor Relations Board has elected not to enter because State law is consistent with Federal policy was given to the National Labor Relations Board, guided by language of statute empowering such Board to cede its jurisdiction to a State agency, and such decision cannot be made by State labor agencies, State courts or the Supreme Court. National Labor Relations Act (sec. 10(a) as amended 29 U.S.C.A. sec. 160(a)).

Mr. Mozart G. Ratner, Chicago, Ill., for petitioners.

Mr. Stanley Denlinger, Akron, Ohio, for respondent.

Mr. Chief Justice Warren delivered the opinion of the Court.

Respondent operates three meat markets in the vicinity of Akron, Ohio. All of its sales are intrastate, but of its purchases in 1 year totaling not quite $900,000, slightly more than $100,000 worth came from outside Ohio directly and as much or more indirectly. Petitioner union, after an unsuccessful attempt to organize respondent's employees, asked respondent for recognition as their bargaining agent and for a union shop contract. When respondent refused to enter into such a contract, the union picketed respondent's stores and put some secondary pressure on its suppliers. Upon respondent's complaint, the court of common pleas enjoined the union from picketing respondent, from trespassing upon respondent's premises and from exerting secondary pressure on the suppliers. Petitioners objected throughout that the jurisdiction of the National Labor Relations Board was exclusive. On appeal, the Ohio Court of Appeals (99 Ohio App. 517, 135 N.E. 2d 692) found that respondent's business was "purely of a local character" and interstate commerce, therefore, was not burdened or obstructed. The court of appeals held that the union's picketing was unlawful according to Ohio policy, and it continued in effect the injunction granted by the court of common pleas.[1] The Ohio Supreme Court dismissed an appeal "for the reason that no debatable constitutional question is involved."[2] We granted certiorari (351 U.S. 922, 76 S.Ct. 779).

[1, 2] We do not agree that respondent's interstate purchases were so negligible that its business cannot be said to affect interstate commerce within the meaning of section 2(7) of the National Labor Relations Act.[3] Cf. National Labor Relations Board v. Denver Building & Construction Trades Council (341 U.S. 675, 683–685, 71 S. Ct. 943, 948–949, 95 L. Ed. 1284). In this case, unlike Guss v. Utah Labor Relations Board (353 U.S. 1, 77 S. Ct. 598), and San Diego Building Trades Council v. Garmon (353 U.S. 26, 77 S. Ct. 607), no effort was made to invoke the jurisdiction of the National Labor Relations Board. Although the extent of respondent's interstate activity seems greater even than that in Building Trades Council v. Kinard Construction Co. (346 U.S. 933, 74 S. Ct. 373, 98 L. Ed. 423), we will assume that this is a case where it was obvious that the Board would decline jurisdiction.[4]

[3, 4] On this view of the case, our decision in Guss v. Utah Labor Relations Board (353 U.S. 1, 77 S. Ct. 598), controls. If the proviso to section 10(a) of the National Labor Relations Act (29 U.S.C. 160(a)) operates to exclude State labor boards from disputes within the National Board's jurisdiction in the absence of a cession agreement, it must also exclude State courts. See Garner v. Teamsters, etc., Union (346 U.S. 485, 491, 74 S. Ct. 161, 166, 98 L. Ed. 228). The conduct here restrained—an effort by a union not representing a majority of his employees to compel an employer to agree to a union shop contract—is conduct of which the National Act has taken hold. Section 8(b)(2), 61 Stat. 141, 29 U.S.C. 158 (b)(2), 29 U.S.C.A. 158(b)(2). Garner v. Teamsters, etc., Union, supra, teaches that in such circumstances a State cannot afford a remedy parallel to that provided by the act.

(5) It is urged in this case and its companions, however, that State action should be permitted within the area of commerce which the National Board has elected not to enter when such action is consistent with the policy of the National Act. We stated our belief in Guss v. Utah Labor Relations Board (353 U.S. 10, 11, 77 S. Ct. 603) that "Congress has expressed its judgment in favor of uniformity." We add that Congress did not leave it to State labor agencies, to State courts or to this Court to decide how consistent with Federal policy State law must be. The power to make that decision in the first instance was given to the National Labor Relations Board, guided by the language of the proviso to section 10(a). This case is an excellent example of one of the reasons why, it may be, Congress was specific in its requirement of uniformity. Petitioners here contend that respondent was guilty of what would be unfair labor practices under the National Act and that the outcome of proceedings before the National Board would, for that reason, have been entirely different from the outcome of the proceedings in the State courts. Without expressing any opinion as to whether the record bears out its factual contention, we note that the opinion of the Ohio Court of Appeals takes no account of the alleged unfair labor practice activity of the employer. Thus, it cannot be said with certainty whether the State court's decree is consistent with the National Act.

One final point remains to be considered. At two of respondent's stores, located in suburban shopping centers, the picketing occurred on land owned by or leased to respondent though open to the public for access to the stores. As one of the reasons for finding the picketing unlawful, the Court of Appeals recited this fact, and "trespassing upon plaintiff's property" is one of the activities specifically enjoined. Whether a State may frame and enforce an injunction aimed narrowly at a trespass of this sort is a question that is not here. Here the unitary judgment of the Ohio court was based on the erroneous premise that it had power to reach the union's conduct in its entirety. Whether its conclusion as to the mere act of trespass would have been the same outside of the context of petitioner's other conduct we cannot know. The judgment therefore is vacated and the case remanded for proceedings not inconsistent with this opinion.

Vacated and remanded.

Mr. Justice Whittaker took no part in the consideration or decision of this case.

For dissenting opinion of Mr. Justice Burton and Mr. Justice Clark, see 353 U.S. 1, 77 S. Ct. 609.

[4] The Board's current standards for asserting jurisdiction over retail stores call for annual direct imports from out of State of $1 million or indirect imports of $2 million. Hogue & Knott Supermarkets (110 N.L.R.B. 543). We leave aside the question whether the presence of secondary pressure on respondent's suppliers would have affected the Board's decision whether to take jurisdiction.

Mr. MORSE. The Fairlawn Markets case is one of the decisions to which I referred earlier in my speech and from which I intended to take quotations. Let me cite some other cases.

The act on its face thus evidences the intention of Congress to exercise whatever power is constitutionally given to it to regulate commerce NLRB v. Fainblatt (306 U.S. 601).

But even if the activity be local and though it may not be regarded as commerce, it may still, whatever its nature, be reached by Congress if it exerts a substantial economic effect on interstate commerce, and this irrespective of whether such effect is what might at some earlier time have been defined as "direct" or "indirect"—Polish National Alliance (136 F. (2d) 175, 180 (C.C.A. 7)).

The following cases decided by the courts show the exercise of the Federal power in the kind of enterprise indicated: A city transit company—Baltimore Transit v. NLRB (certiorari denied, 321 U.S. 795); local retail lumber yards—San Diego Unions v. Garmon (353 U.S. 27); department stores—May Department Store v. NLRB (326 U.S. 376); a fruit packing company—Santa Cruz Food Packing Co. v. NLRB (303 U.S. 453); a small building contractor—Denver Building Trades v. NLRB (341 U.S. 675); hotels—Leedom v. Hotel Employees (358 U.S. 99).

I have selected only a few decisions. Throughout this line of decisions runs the constitutional principle to which I now allude, and on which I am perfectly willing to premise the bill now before the Senate.

Chief Justice Warren in the Fairlawn case said:

Respondent operates three meat markets in the vicinity of Akron, Ohio. All of its sales are intrastate, but of its purchases in 1 year totaling not quite $900,000, slightly more than $100,000 worth came from outside Ohio directly and as much or more indirectly. Petitioner union, after an unsuccessful attempt to organize respondent's employees, asked respondent for recognition as their bargaining agent and for a union shop contract. When respondent refused to enter into such a contract, the union picketed respondent's stores and put some secondary pressure on its suppliers. Upon respondent's complaint, the court of common pleas enjoined the union from picketing respondent, from trespassing upon respondent's premises, and from exerting secondary pressure on the suppliers. Petitioners objected throughout that the jurisdiction of the National Labor Relations Board was exclusive. On appeal, the Ohio Court of Appeals (99 Ohio App. 517, 135 N.E. 2d 692) found that respondent's business was purely of a local character and interstate commerce, therefore, was not burdened or obstructed. The court of appeals held that the union's picketing was unlawful according to Ohio policy, and it continued in effect the injunction granted by the court of common pleas. The Ohio Supreme Court dismissed an appeal for the reason that no debatable constitutional question is involved. We granted certiorari, 351 U.S. 922, 76 S. Ct. 779.

[1, 2] We do not agree that respondent's interstate purchases were so negligible that its business cannot be said to affect interstate commerce within the meaning of section 2(7) of the National Labor Relations Act. Cf. National Labor Relations Board v. Denver Building & Construction Trades Council (341 U.S. 675, 683–685, 71 S. Ct. 943, 948–949, 95 L. Ed. 1284). In this case, unlike Guss v. Utah Labor Relations Board (353 U.S. 1, 77 S. Ct. 598), and San Diego Building Trades Council v. Garmon (353 U.S. 26, 77 S. Ct. 607), no effort was made to invoke the jurisdiction of the National Labor Relations Board. Although the extent of respondent's interstate activity seems greater even than that in Building Trades Council v. Kinard Construction Co. (346 U.S. 933, 74 S. Ct. 373, 98 L. Ed. 423), we will assume that this is a case where it was obvious that the Board would decline jurisdiction.

[3, 4] On this view of the case, our decision in Guss v. Utah Labor Relations Board (353 U.S. 1, 77 S. Ct. 598), controls. If the proviso to section 10(a) of the National Labor Relations Act, 29 U.S.C.A. section 160(a) operates to exclude State labor boards from disputes within the National Board's jurisdiction in the absence of a cession agreement, it must also exclude State courts. See Garner v. Teamsters, etc., Union (346 U.S. 485, 491, 74 S. Ct. 161, 166, 98 L. Ed. 228). The conduct here restrained—an effort by a union not representing a majority of his employees to compel an employer to agree to a union shop contract—is conduct of which the National Act has taken hold. Section 8(b)(2), 61 Stat. 141, 29 U.S.C. section 158(b)(2), 29 U.S.C.A. section 158(b)(2). Garner v. Teamsters, etc., Union, supra, teaches that in such circumstances a State cannot afford a remedy parallel to that provided by the Act.

[5] It is urged in this case and its companions, however, that State action should be permitted within the area of commerce which the National Board has elected not to enter when such action is consistent with the policy of the National Act. We stated our belief in Guss v. Utah Labor Relations Board (353 U.S. 10, 11, 77 S. Ct. 603) that "Congress has expressed its judgment in favor of uniformity." We add that Congress did not leave it to State labor agencies, to State courts or to this Court to decide how consistent with Federal policy State law must be.

I cite that case not for the latter part of it, but for the point that the Supreme Court found that in a fact situation such as the one before the Court, this particular concern engaged in a business that affected interstate commerce and therefore fell within Federal jurisdiction.

Senators will find the same premise running through the other cases. Mr. Hugo Black participated in several of those cases to sustain the position that the commerce clause applies to the fact situations of those cases.

I close now by saying that the issue before us is whether or not the Senate will deny to many thousands of workers in this country the protection of the commerce clause of the Constitution merely because of great employer pressure, on the ground that it would be to their economic disadvantage to have to pay these workers a decent wage.

The Senator from Illinois [Mr. DIRKSEN] makes a very persuasive appeal in regard to the little telephone operators in Illinois and the supplying of a family out in the hills with telephone service. He forgot to tell us that the Senate bill exempts such workers. They are not covered. He made that great plea before the Senate committee. As he knows, the exemption is there.

These are part-time telephone operators. For the most part, they are the wives of farmers. The telephone exchange is in the house, and the housewife goes about her kitchen business, and still operates the little telephone exchange at the same time. A persuasive appeal was made by the Senator from Illinois in behalf of those operators, and they were taken care of in the pending bill.

What the Senator from Illinois wishes to do is to take out from coverage millions of workers whom the committee bill covers. The committee bill went too far in the direction of exemptions. However, the Senator from Massachusets and others in the committee felt that in view of the situation which confronted us we ought to go as far as we could in the committee bill. That is what we did in bringing the bill to the Senate.

The Senator from Illinois says that his amendment is as far as we can go at this time. Time will tell. We are going to conference. We should not so weaken the bill on the floor of the Senate that we will weaken our conferees in conference. The Senator from Illinois is right; when we sit down with House conferees on labor legislation we are in a very difficult conference.

We found that out last September. I refused to yield last September, and I shall always be proud of the record I made in refusing to accept concessions that were made in conference. However, I do not believe that the situation is parallel.

Today, both the Republican Party and the Democratic Party are pledged to the American people to pass Fair Labor Act amendments at this session of Congress. I believe we should take to conference a fair bill. The bill which the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. KENNEDY] has brought from the committee to the Senate is a fair bill. It is the minimum bill we ought to take to conference. Therefore, I strongly recommend the defeat of the Dirksen amendment.

I yield 2 minutes to the Senator from New Jersey.

Mr. WILLIAMS of New Jersey. Mr. President, I should like to ask the minority leader to clarify one portion of his substitute. It relates to the portion dealing with Puerto Rico, the Virgin Islands, and Samoa. As I read the substitute no increase is provided in the minimum wage for those areas. Is that correct?

Mr. DIRKSEN. That is correct.

Mr. WILLIAMS of New Jersey. In view of the fact that the substitute contains an increase from $1 to $1.15 for all other covered workers, is it equal justice for some covered workers to be excluded? It seems to me that if we are to cover all workers, other than the workers in the islands, and increase their wage to $1.15, the substitute should at least provide a percentage increase for Puerto Rico and other places. As the Senator from Illinois knows, under the Kennedy bill the increase for Puerto Rico and the other islands is fixed at 15 percent.

Mr. DIRKSEN. We left it precisely where it is. Advisory committees may be called on by the Secretary of Labor to deal with that point.

Mr. WILLIAMS of New Jersey. But the substitute does not deal with it.. Is that correct?

Mr. DIRKSEN. That is correct.

Mr. WILLIAMS of New Jersey. I point out, first, the obvious fact that the workers are not assured by the industrial commissions, of any increase, and to that extent they are not being accorded equal justice with other covered employees.

Mr. DIRKSEN. That is correct; there must be a finding.

Mr. WILLIAMS of New Jersey. The second point is that in the Northeastern part of the country—and I represent one of the States there—there is an extensive textile and garment industry, which is in competition with goods produced in Puerto Rico. There is the fear that this new disparity will produce what some of us describe as the runaway shop. It runs away from the higher cost area to the lower cost area. That is our fear in connection with the substitute. We fear that it will create an imbalance in our competitive position vis-a-vis Puerto Rico.

Mr. DIRKSEN. I heard no compelling testimony to make any modification in that respect in the substitute.

Mr. WILLIAMS of New Jersey. I wish to make clear that there is this disability.

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, I yield 5 minutes to the distinguished senior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. CLARK].

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, it seems desirable to state for the RECORD what is wrong with the Dirksen substitute amendment. I regret that my powers of wit and satire are not such that I can match those of the distinguished Senator from Illinois. I am sure that if the other 99 Members of the Senate were as clever and as witty as he, we would be able to charge admission, and the people in the galleries would be willing to pay it. This might help to reduce the deficit which has marked so many years of the Eisenhower administration. But I do not have that ability, so no one will be amused by what I say. However, perhaps the RECORD will show why, in my judgment, the Senate will roundly defeat the Dirksen amendment.

There are five things wrong with the Dirksen amendment. First, the minimum wage that it sets is too low. It sets the maximum figure at $1.15, and that is too low to enable an individual to live in decency in many, if not most, of the areas of the country. Certainly it is too low to permit an individual to marry and raise a family. It cannot be done. The committee bill raises the minimum wage in gradual stages to $1.25, in accordance with the pledge of the Democratic platform. That, to my way of thinking, is the absolute minimum.

The Dirksen amendment is inadequate, also, in that the wage of a relatively small number of additional employees who are brought under coverage is fixed permanently at $1 an hour. This creates rank discrimination between those presently covered and those about to be covered to the tune of 15 cents an hour—no insubstantial amount. There is no escalator clause for the newly covered. They remain at $1 an hour until such time as Congress, in its wisdom, in later years undertakes to raise the amount, and the President is willing to approve it.

These two deficiencies in the amount of the minimum wage would be sufficient in themselves to call for the defeat of the Dirksen amendment.

The second thing which is wrong with the amendment is that it makes no provision for overtime. It deals only with the minimum wage, whereas the committee bill makes a sincere and intelligent attempt to deal with the overtime problem through a graduated scale of hours which may be worked, the number of hours decreasing through a 4-year period, so that finally a 40-hour week is established as the standard number of hours of weekly work for those who must be paid a minimum wage for those hours. I believe the failure to provide for the inclusion of overtime is a major defect in the Dirksen amendment.

The third thing wrong with the pending amendment is that the coverage is too narrow. The committee bill would bring under its coverage almost 5 million additional employees. Even the administration bill would bring under its coverage 3,146,000 additional employees. But the pallid Dirksen substitute calls for extended coverage, at an inadequate minimum wage, of 1,600,000 additional employees.

The fourth thing wrong with the Dirksen amendment is that it contains several technical deficiences. One of the most difficult areas in which minimum wage legislation must operate is with respect to employees a large part of whose compensation consists of tips. The Dirksen amendment ducks the whole question. It brings hotels and restaurants within its coverage if they are large enough to operate in two or more States, but it does not face up to the problem of tips. This is a technical deficiency which would render the administration of the act almost impossible.

Another technical deficiency is that while the amendment deals with large-scale chains which operate in two or more States, it would permit a large-scale chain which operated in only one State to compete with chains operating in two or more States without having to pay minimum wages. This is grossly unfair in connection with the efforts being made to bring profitable large-scale chain operations within the minimum wage law.

The third technical deficiency has been adverted to by the distinguished Senator from New Jersey [Mr. WILLIAMS]; namely, that the Dirksen amendment ignores the existence of Puerto Rico, American Samoa, the Virgin Islands, and other American territory where wages are abysmally low, and where local conditions make it impossible, if not undesirable, to extend the full benefits of the minimum wage legislation. However, we ought, at least, to make a start. The Dirksen substitute completely ignores the problem.

The fifth and last thing which is wrong with the Dirksen substitute, to my way of thinking, is that it violates both the Republican platform and the Democratic platform.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time of the Senator from Pennsylvania has expired.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, may I have 2 additional minutes?

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, I yield 2 additional minutes to the Senator from Pennsylvania.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, the sad thing to me is to see the distinguished minority leader, close as he is to the President of the United States, going to confer with him about matters of state once or twice a week, coming here and, within a few weeks of the time when the Republican National Convention adopted a platform which pledges that it will extend the minimum wage coverage to several million more workers, proposing extended coverage for less than 2 million.

I shall quote that part of the Republican platform:

> Upward revision in amount and extended coverage of the minimum wage of several million more workers.

The amendment of the distinguished minority leader, representing the great Republican Party, is a clear violation of the Republican national platform.

Similarly, the Dirksen amendment, I say to Senators on this side of the aisle, is a clear violation of the Democratic platform, which, as I pointed out earlier today in connection with another amendment, reads:

> We pledge to raise the minimum wage to $1.25 an hour and to extend coverage to several million workers not now protected.

The committee bill extends such coverage; the Dirksen amendment does not. For these reasons, I hope the Dirksen amendment will be defeated.

I yield back the remainder of my time, if any remains.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, I yield 5 minutes to the senior Senator from Ohio [Mr. LAUSCHE].

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HART in the chair). The Senator from Ohio is recognized for 5 minutes.

Mr. LAUSCHE. Mr. President, I will vote in favor of the Dirksen amendment.

On the floor of the Senate during the past week I expressed my vigorous opposition to any attempt in this Congress to rewrite the Constitution and to declare what is naturally and legitimately intrastate business to be interstate business.

The bill which has been reported by the committee in one sweep has declared all business within the Nation to be engaged in interstate commerce. After making the declaration that all business in the Nation is engaged in interstate commerce, the bill the committee reported proceeds to exempt a number of business operations. Mr. President, I cannot bring myself to the conclusion that in this country we are living under business conditions that mean that everything done within the country falls within the definition of interstate commerce, and therefore is subject to control by the Federal Congress.

If in Ohio, at the Four Corners, there is a stand where fruit is sold, and if that vendor, who sells lemons, oranges, and other citrus fruit, does an annual business of $1 million or more, he will be subject to this proposed control by the Congress.

Mr. President, I do not favor the purpose of having the Congress usurp functions that do not legitimately belong to it, but which historically have belonged to the States.

I tried with all my might to imagine any business enterprise which under the definitions set forth in the committee bill would not become subject to the direction the bill would impose. Perhaps a farmer who sold his goods by the roadside would not be engaged in interstate commerce, as covered by this bill; but even he would be, I suppose, if he used a wagon to haul from the fields the potatoes he had grown; under the provisions of the committee bill, no doubt he would be held to be engaged in interstate commerce, and the ground of the claim that he was engaged in interstate commerce would be that the iron in the wheels of his wagon was made from ore that came from Minnesota, and the lumber used in the wagon came from the forests of Oregon, and the paint on the wagon was made from lead mined in Colorado.

In fact, Mr. President, I cannot imagine a single operation that would not come within the basic meaning and purpose of this proposed law.

Rather cleverly, Mr. President, after all business and all business operations have been pulled within the application of the proposed law, the sponsors of the bill proceed by means of the artificial definition that if a business is less than a million-dollar business, it will not be covered.

I pose this question: If in 1960 it is deemed advisable to fix the qualifying amount at $1 million, what will prevent the political parties in 1964 from reducing the amount to $500,000 or to $10,000?

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. LAUSCHE. I prefer to finish my argument.

Mr. President, if this Congress says it can fix $1 million as the qualifying amount, ipso facto the Congress can subsequently reduce the amount to suit its own convenience. And what is the convenience? The convenience is to choose at the political conventions a formula which might attract the largest number of votes; and that formula may not be consistent with what is in the best interests of the future life of our country.

It has been argued that there have been violations of the political platforms. Mr. President, if we are to carry into effect to the letter the extravagant promises made in the party platforms, I say to my colleagues that it will not be long before the abyss will be before us, concerning the future life of our Nation. Platforms are written to attract votes. Platforms are written to make the greatest number of promises to the greatest number of blocs. Political platforms vie with each other in attempting to see which of the two is going to promise the most, even though the general taxpayer has nothing to say about it, and has to pay the bill.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, will the Senator from Ohio yield?

Mr. LAUSCHE. No, Mr. President, I do not yield at this time.

The other day I read in a newspaper some articles written by a Scripps-Howard writer; I believe his name is Shackleford. The articles dealt with Cuba; and, of course, they dealt primarily with Castro. My recollection is that at the conclusion of one of the articles, the writer stated that Castro had made some appeal to the peasants of Cuba; and the article concluded with the statement:

> He has promised pie in the sky to the peasants of Cuba, and by those promises has placed a harness upon them.

"Pie in the sky promised by Castro." Mr. President, I do not know what definition I would apply to that man; but if making extravagant promises and agreeing to deliver sumptuously and without limit and without realistic consideration constitutes Castroism, I very sorrowfully say that we have a great deal of that in the party platforms and in the declarations made by candidates in our country.

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President——

Mr. CARROLL. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, I yield myself 2 minutes——

Mr. LAUSCHE. Mr. President, is my time up?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair is advised that the time yielded to the Senator from Ohio has expired.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, I would gladly yield additional time to the Senator from Ohio, but I am sorry to state that I am unable to do so.

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, I yield 1 additional minute to the Senator from Ohio, from the time available to me.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Ohio is recognized for 1 additional minute.

Mr. LAUSCHE. I thank the Senator from Oregon.

Mr. President, what can we expect after this proposed leap has been made? This is the first year in which the promises are going to be fulfilled; this is the beginning. But further advances will be made. I predict that when those advances are made in the future, the net result will be that all operations will finally become embraced and governed and controlled by actions of the Congress.

I have faith in the Congress; but I know that Congress is made up of men who are weak and are motivated by ambitions, and frequently are primarily concerned only with success at election time. So each 2 years and each 4 years there will be a repetition and a further encroachment by Congress upon these operations of the citizenry and a usurpation of the rights of the citizenry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The additional time yielded to the Senator from Ohio has expired.

Mr. MORSE. I yield myself 3 minutes in reply to the Senator from Ohio.

I never fully realized that my beloved and respected friend from Ohio was as much a cynic as he demonstrated he is in the argument he just made. I was quite surprised at his evaluation of the purpose of a party platform.

I hope that a party platform is an expression of a political philosophy of a party. That is my belief, and I think the Democratic Party in Los Angeles set forth the philosophy of the Democratic Party in the year 1960, which, in my judgment, is but an extension of the philosophy of Jefferson as it has been developed and implemented and effectuated through the period of time since that great man occupied the White House.

Furthermore, it seems to me that the Senator from Ohio by implication has not expressed a very high opinion of the intelligence of the American voters. In my opinion, voters in the United States cannot be bribed. Our voters are highly literate. Our voters are very intelligent. There is quite a difference between voters in the United States and voters of some areas of the world to which the Senator from Ohio has alluded.

Our platform is a platform which seeks to put into effect a basic principle of the Democratic Party; namely, that human values come first. We have before us this afternoon a bill which is based upon an obligation of the Democratic Party to promote human values of the underpaid workers of this country now being denied a fair minimum wage.

I say, most respectfully, that I reached the conclusion, after listening to the Senator from Ohio, that he does not like the interpretations of the Supreme Court in the interstate commerce clause cases; but it also happens to be part and parcel of our system of government that there is vested in the U.S. Supreme Court the authority to apply the Constitution of the United States, and it has applied that Constitution in a whole series of decisions bearing upon interstate commerce. I cited some of those decisions this afternoon, and reported one of them.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time of the Senator has expired.

Mr. MORSE. I yield myself 2 more minutes.

I discussed the Fairlawn case a few minutes ago. There is no stronger case than the Fairlawn case, because it was a case in which the NLRB refused to take jurisdiction. It refused to act, not because it did not have jurisdiction, but because the workload of the Board was such that the case fell into the class of cases then known as the no man's land cases. So the Ohio courts took jurisdiction.

What does the Fairlawn decision mean? It means, in essence, that because the Board has power under the commerce clause (even though it chose not to exercise the power) the Ohio courts were preempted from asserting jurisdiction. Here then a local meat market of the sort we propose to cover here just the way we chose to exercise the Federal power in 1935 when we passed the Wagner Act.

So I say to the Senator from Ohio that what we are dealing with is the application of the commerce clause of the Constitution.

The last point I wish to make is that we cannot repeal the commerce clause. Neither can we pass a piece of legislation that goes beyond the commerce clause. But we can pass legislation that provides for coverage, under the minimum wage law, of workers who are not now covered, but who could be covered under the commerce clause. That is the legal issue here involved.

What the Senator from Ohio is saying, in effect, is that he does not think, as a matter of policy, we should give uniformity of treatment under the commerce clause as applied by the U.S. Supreme Court. He asked the question, What will Congress do in 1964 or 1968?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time of the Senator has expired.

Mr. MORSE. I yield myself 1 minute. The Senator from Ohio asked whether in 1964 or 1968 the Congress would reduce the $1 million limitation to $500,000.

My answer is, "I hope so." I think it should do so in 1960.

He raised the question as to whether future Congresses would eliminate the exemption also. My answer is, "I hope so." I think it should do so in 1960.

Mr. President, for many years I taught what I consider to be one of the basic tenents of justice, namely, that in this Republic, people falling under the same classification, under the same facts, ought to have uniform treatment before the law. We are doing an injustice to those people who are entitled to the protection under the commerce clause, but who are not now being protected.

What the Dirksen amendment proposes to do is deny protection to many thousands of workers that the Kennedy bill as brought forth by the committee gives to them.

What we ought to do is recognize that this constitutional issue should be left to the U.S. Supreme Court, and we should stop curbstoning upon it on the floor of the Senate.

Mr. President, I yield 5 minutes to the Senator from Colorado [Mr. CARROLL].

Mr. CARROLL. Mr. President, let me say to the Senator from Ohio—and I say this in all good conscience, speaking as a lawyer, and inasmuch as he has raised some interesting thoughts which are disturbing to the junior Senator from Colorado—that I have tried to look into this bill very carefully. In debate on the floor the other day, I made the assertion that in my opinion this was not a bill which covered all retail trade. Yet that was the point I understood the Senator from Ohio was attempting to assert.

The Senator from Ohio made the statement that the Kennedy bill draws into the stream of interstate commerce all retail and service trade; that the Congress is attempting to assert its legislative authority over all intrastate business activity. This I do not believe to be the case, and I want to make a legislative record here and now. There are certain types of businesses which are entirely local in nature—and I ask the Senator from Oregon to check me—which may exceed $1 million gross and which may not be covered by this bill. Is that statement correct or not?

Mr. MORSE. Hypothetically, yes. If it is shown that the business makes more than $1 million, but the business is completely intrastate, it is not covered by the bill. I may add that that would be true whether it did $1 million worth of business or $1 worth of business.

Mr. LAUSCHE. Mr. President, will the Senator permit me to ask a question?

Mr. CARROLL. Let us assume that in the State of Colorado, where we have coal, a little corporation or an individual mines coal and sells it to the retail trade. He mines, produces it, and transports it in intrastate commerce—not in interstate commerce. It is no burden; it is no obstruction to interstate commerce. With those facts in mind, it being entirely intrastate, how could the Congress assume constitutional jurisdiction under those circumstances?

Does the Senator from Oregon care to comment on that situation?

Mr. MORSE. I will say what Chief Justice Warren said in the Fairlawn case. Case after case which has been decided by the Court shows how meticulous the Court is in setting out the operative facts in the case in the beginning of the decision, on which to base its determination as to whether it is dealing with interstate or intrastate business. If the Court finds, after it analyzes the facts of the case, that it is dealing with interstate commerce business, it then applies the interstate commerce law, provided that, under the particular statute it is asked to apply, interstate commerce is covered.

Speaking hypothetically again, if the coal company is a company which mines entirely in Colorado, and assuming the machinery is manufactured in Colorado, there is not a set of facts under which it can be shown there is a business substantially affected by interstate commerce. If it is solely intrastate commerce, then the bill would not apply.

I refer the Senator again to the Fairlawn case. The Fairlawn decision was that, out of some $900,000 worth of business, slightly more than $100,000 directly came from outside the State, and the Chief Justice said that much or more came indirectly, so the Court held that the business affected interstate commerce.

Mr. DIRKSEN and Mr. LAUSCHE addressed the Chair.

Mr. CARROLL. May I pursue this, point? Then I shall be happy to yield.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Let the Senator yield on this particular point.

Mr. CARROLL. No.

Mr. DIRKSEN. If the Senator refers to the decision, he will discover that the Court said the amount of direct purchases in interstate commerce was not "negligible." That was the language.

Mr. CARROLL. If I may, I am going to consider that case.

Mr. LAUSCHE. Will the Senator yield to me for 2 seconds?

Mr. CARROLL. If the Senator will permit, I will talk about the Ohio case.

Mr. LAUSCHE. Let me say what the Senator from Oregon [Mr. MORSE] said.

Mr. CARROLL. I am forced to yield. [Laughter.] I yield.

Mr. LAUSCHE. The Senator from Oregon [Mr. MORSE] said that if the coal were all taken out of Colorado mines and the machinery used were all manufactured in Colorado, the business would not be covered. I suggest to the Senator that probably the machinery would be bought from a Columbus, Ohio, firm, to do the mining in Colorado.

Mr. CARROLL. If I may finish, I shall answer that in a moment, if I can. I should like to go back to the meat market case which arose in Ohio.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time of the Senator from Colorado has expired.

Mr. MORSE. I yield 2 more minutes to the Senator from Colorado, but in yielding the 2 minutes I wish to read for the benefit of the Senator from Illinois [Mr. DIRKSEN] what Chief Justice Warren said.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Will the Senator read all of it?

Mr. MORSE. I put the entire statement in the RECORD.

Mr. CARROLL. Mr. President, is this time being taken out of my time?

Mr. MORSE. No. It is coming from my time.

All of its sales are intrastate, but of its purchases in 1 year totaling not quite $900,000, slightly more than $100,000 worth came from outside Ohio directly and as much or more indirectly.

I respectfully submit that that is the operative fact which the Court found on which to base its finding in respect to interstate commerce.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Oregon yield to the Senator from Colorado; and, if so, how much time?

Mr. MORSE. I yield 3 minutes to the Senator from Colorado.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Colorado is recognized for 3 minutes.

Mr. CARROLL. Mr. President, when we begin to develop the facts in this situation we see that it is not true that the Congress is trying to invade the field of purely intrastate commerce.

I do not agree with the Senator from Oregon, able lawyer though he is, that if the machinery should come from outside Colorado this would therefore cause an obstruction or a burden to the flow of interstate commerce. This is what a court would necessarily decide.

I should like to cite another hypothetical case. The Senator has given the Supreme Court the decision about the butcher shop in Ohio.

Cattle are produced in Colorado. Let us assume that the cattle are slaughtered and packed, and that all meat is sold at retail in Colorado. The cattle never touch the stream of interstate commerce. This Congress, in my opinion would have no constitutional jurisdiction to impose minimum wage and hour restrictions on this type of intrastate activity.

Mr. LAUSCHE. What about the knife or the ax which would be used to kill the cattle? Would that come from Ohio? [Laughter.]

Mr. CARROLL. This is exactly why I wish to lay this ghost at rest once and for all. This business of a barber shaving a man with a piece of steel which came from Columbus, or a bootblack shining a man's shoes with an ingredient which came from Illinois——

Mr. DIRKSEN. I thank the Senator. [Laughter.]

Mr. CARROLL. We should cut out this nonsense about shoe polish and razors and get down to what we are trying to do in this particular bill.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. CARROLL. I am happy to yield.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. Does the Senator believe that if the butcher shop which slaughtered the meat sold more than a million dollars worth of meat it would not be covered?

Mr. CARROLL. It is my contention that if the meat were all sold within the State of Colorado the activity would be a intrastate. The cattle would be slaughtered, dressed, refrigerated, and sold within the State. The Federal Government would have no constitutional jurisdiction over the operation.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. The pending bill would cover the transaction, would it not?

Mr. CARROLL. We cannot breathe life into it unless it has a constitutional basis.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. Does not the Senator know that many people think the Supreme Court does not recognize the Constitution?

Mr. CARROLL. I do not agree with those people. I think we have a fine Supreme Court. I know this is not agreed to by a few of the Senators who serve in this body, but I am one of those who believe that the Supreme Court has, and will continue to, intelligently interpret the real meaning of our Constitution.

I recognize a fact which is true. It was true under the original Fair Labor Standards Act. It was true under the National Labor Relations Act. It was true when we modified the Act, and when the Taft-Hartley Act was passed. It was true when we passed to the so-called Labor-Management Reform bill.

As the distinguished Senator from Oregon, the distinguished Senator from Pennsylvania, and the very able Senator from Massachusetts have pointed out, in a changing, complex economy, of course the scope of the bill will necessarily be broadened.

I wish to emphasize to my friend from Ohio the real point. The Senator from Ohio has said in all good conscience what he truly believes. The Senator is always sincere. He feels very deeply on this subject. The Senator says that the bill is a product merely of the political party platforms.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The additional time yielded to the Senator from Colorado has expired.

Mr. MORSE. I say to the Senator from Colorado that I am in an embarrassing position. I made a promise to yield some additional time to the minority leader. I wonder if I could be permitted to do so.

Mr. CARROLL. Will the Senator yield me 2 additional minutes?

Mr. MORSE. I have only 2 minutes remaining.

Mr. HOLLAND. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that 10 minutes additional be allowed to each side on this question, so that the debate can be finished.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Florida?

Mr. FULBRIGHT. Mr. President, I think we have heard enough talk on this proposal. I do not think the talk should go longer. I am growing tired. I have been here since 10 o'clock this morning. I object.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Objection is heard.

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, I yield 1 additional minute to the Senator from Colorado.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Colorado is recognized for 1 minute.

Mr. CARROLL. The point I wish to make is that the proposed legislation does not come from the political parties. The Senator from Ohio made a point concerning Mr. Castro, and made some indirect reference to the Senator from Massachusetts. There was some indirect reference, which might almost have a sinister implication, as to the President of the United States. The President has recommended legislation. I do not mean he has recommended the substance of this bill, but he has recommended the principle of it. The Secretary of Labor has asked for increased coverage.

President Eisenhower knows that there ought to be increased coverage. Even my distinguished friend from Illinois knows that there ought to be increased coverage, because that is what he is advocating.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Certainly.

Mr. CARROLL. He is advocating a change in the minimum wage. When one attempts to give a sinister connotation to the effect that there is a Castro-type dictatorial movement behind it—that is sheer nonsense. Leave us get down to consideration of the legislation, discussing our honest differences of opinion.

No one was more entranced and charmed by the able presentation of the Senator from Illinois than I.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The additional time yielded to the Senator from Colorado has expired.

Mr. CARROLL. I agree with the Senator from Arkansas. We have had enough debate. Let us vote on this question. Of course, I shall vote against the proposal of the Senator from Illinois, because I do not think his proposal is comprehensive enough.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time of the Senator has expired.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The PRESIDING OFFICER The question is on agreeing to the amendment in the nature of a substitute offered by the Senator from Illinois [Mr. DIRKSEN]. On this question the yeas and nays have been ordered, and the clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk called the roll.

Mr. MANSFIELD. I announce that the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. CHAVEZ], the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. KEFAUVER], the Senator from Montana [Mr. MURRAY], the Senator from Maine [Mr. MUSKIE], and the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. O'MAHONEY] are absent on official business.

I also announce that the Senator from Missouri [Mr. HENNINGS] is absent because of illness.

I further announce that, if present and voting, the Senator from Missouri [Mr. HENNINGS], the Senator from Montana [Mr. MURRAY], the Senator from Maine [Mr. MUSKIE], and the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. O'MAHONEY] would each vote "nay."

Mr. KUCHEL. I announce that the Senator from Iowa [Mr. MARTIN] is absent by leave of the Senate on official business.

The result was announced—yeas 39, nays 54, as follows:

So Mr. DIRKSEN's amendment in the nature of a substitute was rejected.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill is open to amendment.

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, I move that the Senate reconsider the vote by which the amendment was rejected.

Mr. HUMPHREY. I move to lay that motion on the table.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

Mr. PROUTY. Mr. President, I believe it is well understood that many Senators who voted against the Dirksen amendment did so in the almost certain knowledge that other amendments would be offered which they might possibly be able to support.

Later, at the appropriate time, I shall offer an amendment. I do not intend to offer it at this time. I hope consideration of it can go over until tomorrow, in order that the amendment may be printed and so that Senators may have an opportunity to understand exactly what is contained in it. I understand that some of the other amendments are not in printed form. It is difficult for anyone to understand exactly what is contained in any amendment without having had an opportunity to read it.

I should like to state what the amendment I intend to offer will accomplish.

It eliminates employees of auto dealers from coverage. That will cause a reduction of about 460,000 persons.

It exempts employees of hotels, motels, and restaurants. That would amount to a reduction in coverage of 407,000.

It substitutes for the concept "activity affecting commerce" the term "substantially engaged in doing business as an integral part of commerce or of the production of goods for commerce."

The Labor Department estimates that this would reduce the coverage of the committee-reported bill by roughly 2 or 3 percent, or between 100,000 and 150,000.

For newly covered workers the amendment provides $1 the first year, and $1.10 the second year and thereafter. This is in contrast to the committee bill schedule of $1 the first year, $1.05 the second year, $1.15 the third year, and $1.25 thereafter.

The amendment does not make any change whatever in the provisions of the committee-reported bill affecting workers presently covered by the Fair Labor Standards Act. These workers would still, under the bill, get $1.25 an hour according to the graduated schedule.

As a member of the Committee on Labor and Public Welfare I voted to report the bill to the Senate. I feel, however, that there are some inequities in the bill in its present form. I think we must recognize that unless we compromise on some basis, we may end with no legislation at all. That is the purpose of my amendment, and I shall offer it at the proper time. Also, I shall have mimeographed copies of the amendment placed on the desks of the Senators.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a unanimous-consent request?

Mr. PROUTY. I yield.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that my remarks may appear at this point in the RECORD.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection——

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, reserving the right to object, I should like to ask what the statement is.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Massachusetts reserves the right to object.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, who has the floor?

Mr. PROUTY. I have the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair thought he had recognized the Senator from Illinois, but the Senator from Illinois graciously yielded the floor with the understanding that the Senator from Vermont might yield to the Senator from Pennsylvania.

Mr. HUMPHREY. Mr. President, what was the request of the Senator from Pennsylvania?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That a statement he had prepared be printed at this point in the RECORD.

Mr. SCOTT. That a statement I had prepared be printed in the RECORD.

Mr. HUMPHREY. What is the statement?

Mr. SCOTT. I shall be happy to read it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Pennsylvania asked that it be printed in the RECORD. The Senator from Massachusetts reserved the right to object.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. President, I shall be glad to read the statement.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the distinguished Senator from Vermont may yield to the Senator from Pennsylvania to enable the Senator from Pennsylvania to read his statement, without the Senator from Vermont losing his right to the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, I may want to respond to the statement of the Senator from Pennsylvania, as may other Senators. So if the Senator from Pennsylvania intends to place anything in the RECORD, I think time should be allowed, under unanimous consent, to enable Senators to respond.

Mr. DIRKSEN. The Senator from Vermont has the floor. I make the request broad enough to enable him to yield to any Senator who may be interested for the purpose of making a response.

Mr. PROUTY. Mr. President, I shall be happy to yield to the distinguished Senator from Massachusetts at the completion of the statement to be read by the distinguished Senator from Pennsylvania. However, I do not wish to get into the same difficulty in which I found myself several days ago, when I yielded the floor for about 2½ hours.

Mr. HUMPHREY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Vermont yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. PROUTY. I have yielded to the Senator from Pennsylvania.

Mr. HUMPHREY. Mr. President, I object.

Mr. DIRKSEN. The objection comes too late.

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. President, will the Senator from Minnesota withhold his objection?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Objection is heard by the Senator from Minnesota.

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. President, I ask the Senator from Minnesota if he will withhold his objection?

Mr. HUMPHREY. I withhold it.

Mr. MANSFIELD. With the proviso that it is understood that the Senator from Pennsylvania will read what he has asked to have printed in the RECORD.

Mr. SCOTT. I am fully prepared to read what I have asked to have printed. I merely made the request that it be printed in the interest of time, because there has been so much talk about time being consumed. However, I am fully prepared to read my statement.

Mr. MANSFIELD. If I correctly understand the situation, the Senator from Vermont has agreed with the Senator from Illinois that Senators who may have something to say in opposition to what the Senator from Pennsylvania is about to say will be granted a reasonable length of time to speak in rebuttal.

Mr. PROUTY. I shall yield to any Senator who wishes time to respond.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. On that basis, is there objection?

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for the purpose of enabling me to make a statement?

Mr. PROUTY. I will yield provided I do not lose the floor.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Senator from Vermont may yield to me, with the understanding that he will not lose the floor by doing so, and that this colloquy may appear at another point in the RECORD.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I have spoken with the distinguished chairman——

Mr. FULBRIGHT. Mr. President, may we have order? It seems as though every Senator is talking.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Senators who find it necessary to converse will retire from the Chamber. Staff members will remain quiet. Until there is quiet in the Chamber, the Senator from Texas will suspend. The Senate will be in order.

The Senator from Texas may proceed.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I have conferred with the distinguished minority leader and the chairman of the subcommittee in charge of the bill, the distinguished Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. KENNEDY]. I have also talked with the ranking minority member of the Committee on Labor and Public Welfare, the distinguished Senator from Arizona [Mr. GOLDWATER]. I wish to make a suggestion for the consideration of the Senate.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. Mr. President, may we have order?

Mr. DODD. Mr. President, the Senate is not in order. Everyone mills around. The guests in the galleries must get a very poor impression of the greatest deliberative body in the world.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senate again is requested to be in order. Again the Chair suggests that staff members who must converse retire from the Chamber, and that Senators who find it necessary to discuss matters with other Senators retire from the Chamber.

The Senator from Texas may proceed.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I should like to make a suggestion for the consideration of the Members of the Senate, and with the approval, I believe, of the Senators I have named. First, that we agree not to have any further yea-and-nay votes this evening on the pending measure. Second, that the Senate convene at 10 o'clock tomorrow morning, with the time not to be controlled until 11 o'clock, to enable Senators to have an opportunity to make statements and to make insertions of extraneous matters in the RECORD. Third, that beginning at 11 o'clock the time be limited to 1 hour on any amendment, and any amendments thereto, the time to be equally divided between the proposer of an amendment and the majority leader, in accordance with the usual agreement form which is at the Parliamentarian's desk. There would not be any control of time on the bill itself at this time, but when we reached the amendment stage, a suggestion might be made concerning control of the time on the bill later.

Mr. GOLDWATER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. And further, that there be no control of time this evening. I yield to the Senator from Arizona.

Mr. GOLDWATER. Mr. President, I shall not object to the suggestion. I simply wish to raise a question. All day we have been hearing rumors to the effect that a substitute is being prepared by the other side. If the substitute is offered and it is substantially in the form that I have heard rumors it would be in, that would do away with the necessity of my offering a number of my amendments.

If the substitute is offered some time during tomorrow, could we expect to have a little more time to discuss that subject?

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Yes. I shall be glad to have the Senator's suggestions concerning it.

Mr. GOLDWATER. I do not know what the language of the substitute might be, so I cannot make such a suggestion; but if the distinguished majority leader will keep his views fluid, and we can discuss the question tomorrow, if and when the amendment is offered by the other side, all we want is ample time to discuss it. I think we have already discussed the nature and extent of it, but we would not want to be limited simply to a half hour on an amendment which would be a substitute for the entire bill.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Could the Senator from Arizona provide me with any outline of what the substitute is or how we can identify it? I should be glad to provide 2 hours for the substitute.

Mr. GOLDWATER. It is difficult for me to know what is taking place in the minds of my Democratic friends. Sometimes I wish I knew.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. As a matter of fact, I do not always know what is going on.

Mr. GOLDWATER. I have heard rumors all day on the floor and from people in town that an amendment in the nature of a substitute is being prepared by Senators on the other side. I have not been able to verify that rumor, but I wanted to protect the Senate in the event such an amendment were offered.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, will the Senator from Texas yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I yield.

Mr. DIRKSEN. My understanding—although my information in this respect is undocumented and unverified—is that the distinguished Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. MONRONEY] was preparing a substitute, that it has been revised two or three times, and that he proposed to offer it. As I have said, I cannot verify that; but I am sure that is the item to which the distinguished Senator from Arizona alludes. If we could know, obviously, we could single out that particular one.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Then let us provide that if a substitute is proposed by the Senator from Oklahoma, 2 hours shall be allowed for it.

Mr. GOLDWATER. Let us not confine such an allowance to the proposal of the Senator from Oklahoma, because such a proposal might be submitted by some other Senator.

Mr. HOLLAND. Mr. President, if the Senator will yield, let me say that perhaps I misunderstood the Senator from Vermont, but it is my understanding that his proposal might well be one in the nature of a substitute.

Mr. PROUTY. Yes, it may well be.

Mr. HOLLAND. That is what I understood.

Mr. KEATING. Mr. President, let me ask the distinguished majority leader whether there is implicit or included in his unanimous-consent request any indication of whether the Senate will take a recess or will adjourn this evening.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. None whatever.

Mr. KEATING. So that question is still open, is it?

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Yes. I do not think it makes a great deal of difference. We shall adjourn before the Congress adjourns sine die, as I have stated to a number of Senators.

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, earlier today I understood the Senator to say that he would plan to have the Senate adjourn when action on the bill was concluded.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. No, I did not say that. I said that we certainly plan to adjourn before the session is concluded. And we would normally do that; but the Senate might adjourn before that.

Mr. JAVITS. I stated my understanding earlier, but I will check the RECORD on that point.

Mr. President, may the unanimous-consent request be restated?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Let the Chair ask whether it was a request or a suggestion.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I would have no objection to adjourning when we conclude. We might adjourn before we conclude our action on the bill. But normally we would not.

Mr. JAVITS. I thank the Senator.

Mr. HOLLAND. Mr. President, let me suggest that the one-half hour allowance proposed for each side would be satisfactory in the case of ordinary amendments; but would the Senator consider providing for additional time for amendments in the nature of a substitute, regardless of which Senators might offer them?

I, myself, have no information as to which Senators may offer them; but I understood the Senator from Vermont [Mr. PROUTY] to say that he had an amendment in the nature of a substitute, and I understand that it is possible that the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. MONRONEY] may have such an amendment, although I, myself, know nothing about that.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I would have no objection, if the Senator from Vermont or the Senator from Oklahoma desired to offer amendments in the nature of a substitute which in their opinion would require more than 1 hour of debate, to provide specifically in the unanimous-consent agreement that there be 1 hour on other amendments and not to exceed 2 hours on amendments submitted in that form, if they qualified as substitutes, by the Senator from Vermont and the Senator from Oklahoma.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. I object.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Objection is heard.

USE OF KENNEDY FOUNDATION MONEY TO "OUTBID" THE GOVERNMENT OF THE UNITED STATES

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. President, will the Senator from Vermont yield to me?

Mr. PROUTY. I yield.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. President, at the request of the junior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. KENNEDY], I am very glad to read in full the following statement:

Yesterday I was privileged to announce that the Department of State had offered to provide approximately $100,000 to transport 250 scholarship students from East Africa to enable them to study in the United States. The project is called Airlift Africa, 1960.

Since that time I have been informed that the long arm of the family of the junior Senator from Massachusetts has reached out and attempted to pluck this project away from the U.S. Government. At this moment, they appear to have been successful because they are offering more money than the U.S. Government has offered.

Let us look at some of the events which have led up to this unusual development.

The African-American Student Foundation is an organization of prominent persons in both the United States and Africa who believe that it is vital to the welfare of Africa to assist in the education of that continent's most promising students.

One of its members is Jackie Robinson, the famous retired ballplayer who is now a successful business executive in New York. Last year Mr. Robinson and others raised enough money to bring about 80 African students to this country for study.

A few months ago Jackie Robinson met with Vice President NIXON and asked the Vice President whether the U.S. Government could add financial support to this very important project. The foundation had commitments at that time for about 200 scholarships in class I American institutions of higher learning and had raised money among the African people to provide subsistence for the students. But it was unable to raise approximately $100,000 to transport the students to the United States and back.

The Vice President passed Jackie Robinson's ideas on to the Department of State and in the succeeding months there was a series of letters, telegrams and meetings between the people involved.

There I have reference to the Department of State, to Mr. Jackie Robinson, and to others interested in this matter.

I read further from the statement:

I was interested also in seeing this fine project become a reality and was also involved in some of the correspondence.

Last Saturday morning James Shepley of the Vice President's office called Jackie Robinson in New York to inform him that the Department of State was prepared to provide the $100,000 necessary to make this important project become operative.

Mr. Robinson so notified Frank C. Montero, president of the African-American Students Foundation. Mr. Montero in turn called Mr. Shepley to confirm the details.

He related to Mr. Shepley that during the period immediately after the Democratic National Convention the Kennedy people had offered to make $100,000 available for Airlift Africa, 1960.

But Mr. Montero told Mr. Shepley that he much preferred to accept the U.S. Government's offer, particularly since funds coming from the Department of State would be "above politics," to use Mr. Montero's own words.

He added, however, that he intended to keep an appointment that he had with Mr. Robert Sargent Shriver, a brother-in-law of the junior Senator from Massachusetts, who is also executive director of the Joseph P. Kennedy, Jr., Foundation. The meeting was to be held at 2:30 p.m. on Monday.

Subsequently, Mr. Montero has reported—

And I may add when I refer to reporting, that my information comes from Mr. Jackie Robinson—

Subsequently, Mr. Montero has reported that the Kennedy people would not participate in Airlift Africa as long as the Government of the United States was involved. Mr. Montero reported also that if these same Kennedy people participated they would not only provide the $100,000 needed for this year but would continue their participation for a "4-year period," also his words.

Since my announcement yesterday, Mr. Montero has wired a New York newspaper that the African-American Students Foundation is declining the offer of the U.S. Government and will accept instead an offer of money from a private foundation.

I am surprised at this decision of the African-American Student Foundation, but I can understand the pressures brought by the Kennedy people and their anxiety to take over the functions of the Government in advance of an election.

I am not concerned, however, at the apparent misuse of tax-exempt foundation money for blatant political purposes. Why are the Kennedy people so anxious to commit a foundation to a possible expenditure of $400,000, just 1 day after learning of the action of the Department of State?

And I might add parenthetically here that I understand that a press conference has been held and the answer with respect to the $400,000 has been that the amount involved is $100,000 plus the maintenance of some expenses for the same people rather than bring in new groups of students in each of the succeeding 3 years, as I had thought.

Continuing with my statement:

I wonder if the junior Senator from Massachusetts could tell us whether the private foundation which has outbid the Government of the United States is the Joseph P. Kennedy, Jr., Foundation, of which he is trustee? If this is so, it is involved in a very grave state of affairs, which warrants investigation of the questionable uses to which a supposedly charitable tax-exempt moneypot can be put.

Mr. President, that is the conclusion of the statement, and I say again the information furnished to me and to my office in regard to the major part which I have stated comes from Mr. Jackie Robinson, some of it from the Department of State, and some of it from Mr. Robinson's quotations said to him by Mr. Montero.

I thank the Senator from Vermont for yielding.

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. PROUTY. I yield to the Senator from Massachusetts, provided I do not lose the floor.

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, I regard the statement made by the Senator from Pennsylvania as the most unfair, distorted, and malignant attack I have heard in 14 years in politics. I have received very recently a wire from Mr. Frank Montero, who heads the African-American Students Foundation dated August 16 and received the 17th.

Senator HUGH SCOTT, of Pennsylvania, has announced in Washington earlier today that the State Department has offered $100,000 to the African-American Students Foundation, Inc., to airlift 250 east African students to the United States this September.

We appreciate Senator SCOTT's announcement of the State Department's belated offer in this matter.

This offer however was only made after the foundation, which had repeatedly requested help during the past 12 months and finally turned down late last month, was successful in obtaining a grant of $100,000 from a private foundation. This private foundation has also agreed to provide continuing support for these students during their next 4 years in this country.

It is therefore regrettable that Senator SCOTT would attempt to reap political advantage from this nonpolitical educational program which originated out of the initiative and partnership of responsible east and central African leaders and private American citizens.

The fact is the State Department has repeatedly turned a cold shoulder to the airlift Africa program.

When an emergency situation developed and it appeared that the students would be unable to come to the United States to take advantage of the scholarships so generously offered by more than 200 American colleges and institutions, we turned to a number of private foundations and individuals for help and finally were successful in obtaining the funds.

On Monday of this week the State Department suddenly took interest in the project. Now that the State Department has given recognition to the urgent need to bring large numbers of African students to study in the United States, we hope these funds which they have allocated will be made immediately available to other African students on a continuing basis.

May I say Mr. Robinson arranged for Mr. Montero to see the Vice President in late June. The Vice President stated he was interested in the program, and I believe he was, and he referred Mr. Montero to Mr. Satterthwaite, who is Assistant Secretary of State for Africa. Mr. Satterthwaite, after considering the matter, wrote a letter to Mr. Montero, which I have here, in which he stated the State Department, because of other commitments, would not be able to participate in the airlift of these students.

While I was at Cape Cod I was called by Mr. Montero, who asked me if I would talk to Mr. Mboya. I did not know at that time what he wished to speak to me about. As a matter of fact, I have a copy of the letter from Mr. Satterthwaite to Mr. Robinson, in which he said:

Unfortunately, it does not appear possible to comply with either of the two proposals mentioned in your letter to the Vice President.

So the State Department felt it could not do that. In our conversation he asked if he could get help from private foundations to help them. They had private scholarships. They had raised $200,000, and they needed transportation. I said I did not know what could be done. I asked Mr. Shriver. I talked to my brother, who was a member of the foundation and also the president of the African foundation student exchange for the last 2 years, what could be done. Mr. Shriver talked to other foundations, the Phelps-Stokes, Ford, Marshall Field, and others. The foundations were committed to other programs and could not proceed. I then informed Mr. Montero that the Kennedy Foundation would do it with the understanding that we would not in any way connect the Foundation with the administration of the project.

When Mr. Mboya was there, a press conference was held, and no mention was made of our Foundation's participation. No mention was made of our Foundation's participation until the first of the past week.

What happened was that after we saw one of the foundations and we had decided we could go ahead, some information was evidently given to somebody in the State Department from one of the members of the Foundation.

Mr. Jim Shepley called up Mr. Montero and said he could arrange for $100,000 to be given to this program; and I have a memorandum from Mr. Frank Montero telling the events day by day.

On Wednesday, August 10, Mr. Montero and Mr. Scheinman came to Washington to meet with Mr. Shriver and his associates to further discuss and finally confirm the commitment. The meeting concluded in agreement that the commitment was essentially established, but that final details would be worked out and the matter completely settled in a later meeting to be held on August 15 here in Washington.

On Saturday, August 13, for the first time, Mr. Montero was advised by Mr. James Shepley, a representative of the Vice President's office, that the Vice President's office was again interested in the proposed airlift program. Mr. Shepley was informed by Mr. Montero that a source of private funds was available to underwrite the proposed airlift program. Mr. Shepley indicated that he had just become involved in this proposal and he hoped he could arrange such a definite offer of the cost of transportation being borne by the Government.

I wish to say in conclusion—I do not see any point in dragging this matter out—that the Kennedy Foundation went into this quite reluctantly. I am chairman of the Subcommittee on Africa. I think this is a most important program. We have a good many other commitments in the Foundation. It was not a matter in which we sought to be involved. Nevertheless, Mr. Mboya came to see us and asked for help, when none of the other foundations could give it, when the Federal Government had turned it down quite precisely. We felt something ought to be done. To waste 250 scholarships in this country, to waste $200,000 these people had raised, to disappoint 250 students who hoped to come to this country, it certainly seemed to me, would be most unfortunate, and so we went ahead.

I will say to the Senator that I think it is unfortunate that he has chosen this means of attacking me and the Foundation, suggesting that we wish to spend the money improperly. There is nothing I can say to that.

I merely say to the Senator, whoever does this, it ought to be done. There are a good many other African students who wish to come here. If the $100,000 which Mr. Shepley was able to get from the State Department at this late date can be used beneficially to bring other students to the United States, I would be delighted to do it.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. President will the Senator from Vermont yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator yield?

Mr. PROUTY. I yield to the Senator from Pennsylvania, with the understanding that I do not lose my right to the floor.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. President, disregarding the violation of rule XIX by the junior Senator from Massachusetts, in the use of such words as "malignant" and "unfair," one can understand the emotions charged in the nature of the Senator's reply, and one can sympathize with him.

I say that the major difference between what the Senator from Massachusetts said and what I have said is this: Mr. Montero or someone acting for him discovered that the State Department had agreed to and had approved this program, which led for the first time to the offer being made as a firm offer by the Foundation, according to my information. Prior to that time the most which this "Airlift Africa" had ever been able to get from the so-called "Kennedy people" had been a promise of $5,000, which was raised to $100,000 after the State Department reached its decision.

Moreover, the statement made by the junior Senator from Massachusetts is self-defeating, in that he refers to a memorandum from Mr. Montero in which he says Mr. Shepley stated he was not familiar with or had only gotten into the matter. Mr. Shepley and I had dinner in June and discussed this subject. Mr. Shepley had been active as early as June. Therefore, this alleged memorandum of Mr. Montero, however, it came to be read tonight, is inaccurate and incorrect, because I of my own knowledge had a dinner meeting with Mr. Shepley in June in Washington, and I of my own knowledge know of Mr. Shepley's continued interest, and I know of my continued interest.

I know of the activity of the Kennedy Foundation, which I am glad now to have confirmed. I was very careful in my statement to ask whether it was the Kennedy Foundation. I am glad now to have it affirmed that indeed it was.

Therefore, without any malignance, without any desire to be unfair, I express the hope that the junior Senator from Massachusetts will, when statements are made which are factual and which bear upon actual events which have occurred, maintain the necessary aplomb in this Chamber so as not to refer—and I shall not myself violate rule XIX—to another Senator as "malignant" or "unfair."

As to that I shall rest my own judgment on the judgment of my colleagues, and shall not invoke rule XIX, although the junior Senator from Massachusetts well merits it.

Mr. KEATING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. CANNON. Mr. President, will the Senator from Vermont yield?

Mr. FULBRIGHT. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Vermont yield; and, if so, to whom?

Mr. PROUTY. Mr. President, I yield to the Senator from New York with the understanding that I do not lose my right to the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New York is recognized.

Mr. KEATING. Mr. President, I simply rise to express commendation to the distinguished Senator from Pennsylvania and to the Joseph P. Kennedy Foundation for vying with each other in an effort to achieve a very salutary and worthwhile result. It seems to me a wonderful thing to further our many fine programs to help students from all over the world.

The Department of State is also to be commended for embracing the program that has been urged by the distinguished Senator from Pennsylvania. Similarly, the Kennedy Foundation is deserving of commendation, it seems to me, for also trying to "get into the act." The only question involved, as I see it, is involved in the last paragraph of the statement which the distinguished Senator from Pennsylvania has made.

Mr. President, it is my hope that the Kennedy Foundation, which has performed a great many fine services for people in this country and in other lands, will join forces with the Department of State in an effort to further the extremely worthy project referred to by the junior Senator from Pennsylvania. If such cooperation is the result of the matter being brought up by my friend from Pennsylvania tonight, it seems to me it will have served a useful purpose. There should, of course, be no politics involved [laughter] on the part of the Department of State, which should not engage in political activities, or on the part of the Kennedy Foundation, which as we are also aware should not do this.

I think the Senator from Pennsylvania and our friend from Massachusetts ought to get together and further this project together. I would love to see both of them double the ante again.

Mr. DIRKSEN, Mr. MORSE, and Mr. FULBRIGHT addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Vermont yield; and, if so, to whom?

Mr. PROUTY. I yield to the distinguished minority leader.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, I should like to get back on the track a moment——

Mr. FULBRIGHT. Before the Senator does that, I should like to ask the Senator from Pennsylvania a question.

Mr. DIRKSEN. I wish to find out how we are going to resolve things for the rest of the evening.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. I do not wish to let this matter drop. I should like to ask the Senator from Pennsylvania a few questions.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Pennsylvania yield to the Senator from Arkansas?

Mr. PROUTY. Mr. President, I have yielded to the distinguished minority leader.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. I wish to ask the Senator from Pennsylvania a question about his statement.

Mr. DIRKSEN. I withdraw the request to the distinguished Senator from Vermont.

Mr. PROUTY. Mr. President, I recognize the distinguished Senator from Oregon first, and then I shall yield to the distinguished Senator from Arkansas.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Oregon is recognized.

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, I only wish to say that I think the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. KENNEDY] is entitled to high commendation for the factual statement he has made to the Senate, which I think completely washes out all the implications and innuendoes made in the attack upon him by the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. SCOTT]. I am sure we would not have heard a word from the other side of the aisle if the Rockefeller Foundation had made the grant covering the expenses of the African students.

I wish to commend the Kennedy Foundation for making the grant, because this is exactly the kind of cooperation from private citizens and groups we have been trying to urge in the administration of American foreign policy. We have been trying to interest private groups in our country to assume more of the burden of being of aid in assisting with our student exchange program in foreign lands. We have been urging foundations and private agencies and industry in our country to give more assistance to this very important foreign affairs program. I think it is a wonderful thing that the Kennedy Foundation has done what it has done in this instance.

I think we all know that for the next few weeks the Senator from Massachusetts will be fair game, and the Senator from Texas will be fair game, in the political hunting grounds.

I think, however, the American people have the discernment to determine the difference between fair political shooting and shooting with poisoned arrows.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. PROUTY. I yield to the Senator from Arkansas.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. If I may have the attention of the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. SCOTT], one aspect of his statement interests me very much because I have followed the exchange program for many years. His statement reminded me that last year we had great difficulty in obtaining funds from the State Department to bring some students from Cairo, Egypt, and his statement that Mr. Shepley could have this kind of influence on the distribution of funds interested me.

Will the Senator from Pennsylvania tell us who Mr. Shepley is and what position in the Government he occupies?

Mr. SCOTT. I think Mr. Shepley, like Mr. Robinson and many other good citizens, has a full and complete right to approach the State Department although, to the best of my knowledge, Mr. Shepley is not an official of the U.S. Government.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. Has he any position in the Government?

Mr. SCOTT. Does the Senator from Arkansas feel that those who are not officials should be precluded from making recommendations to the State Department?

Mr. FULBRIGHT. Mr. Shepley from time to time is deemed to be the man who allocated this $100,000. Who is Mr. Shepley? What does he do?

Mr. SCOTT. I would be very glad to have the Senator from Arkansas secure a biography of Mr. Shepley, if that would help him. Mr. Shepley is entitled to make recommendations as is the Senator from Pennsylvania.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. Is the Senator unwilling to tell us of whom he was just now speaking in his statement?

Mr. SCOTT. Not if the Senator from Arkansas is unwilling to give me the opportunity.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. I ask the Senator to please tell me who Mr. Shepley is and what he does.

Mr. SCOTT. I think it was made clear in the statement of the junior Senator from Pennsylvania that Mr. Shepley had elicited the interest of the Vice President in this matter. I cannot say whether Mr. Shepley is employed by the Vice President, but he is certainly a member of the staff of the Vice President. Obviously I cannot say that, because I have no personal knowledge of it. But I do submit to the Senator from Arkansas that if he reads anything improper in my statement, I would be happy to have him indicate it right now on the floor.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. Does the Senator know who does employ Mr. Shepley, or is he unemployed?

Mr. SCOTT. I really do not know on what payroll Mr. Shepley is. I would be glad to oblige the Senator from Arkansas. I do know that Mr. Shepley has some position with the Vice President, and I have said so. I have referred to it, in my statement. If I could tell the Senator more, I should be glad to do so. It the Senator wishes to send for the official records to find out, I will help him discover exactly what Mr. Shepley's salary is and precisely how he is paid. The Senator expects me to have knowledge which he knows perfectly well I would not have.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. The Senator does not deny that in June the State Department rejected the request, does he? The statement was read by the Senator from Massachusetts from a letter written by Mr. Satterthwaite.

Mr. SCOTT. I do not understand the reference to June.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. On July 7 the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. KENNEDY] received an official letter from an employee, a genuine, bona fide employee of the State Department, Mr. J. C. Satterthwaite, whom I know personally, and who is in charge of the African desk. The letter rejects the application for funds. What interested me, among other things, was how Mr. Shepley, whom the Senator apparently does not know very well, can go to the State Department and procure a reversal of its decision. This, I think, is very important because if our State Department has now become the handmaiden of people who are so little known that the Senator from Pennsylvania does not know whether they are employed by the Government or not, we are clearly in very serious circumstances.

I have spent a great deal of time in trying to protect the exchange program from any political influence. I do not know anyone who could stand up and say that appointments under that program have been made because of political influence. Decisions are made in an extremely business-like way, and the procedure has never been criticized, to my knowledge, by any Member of either body on this ground. I think it is most unusual that a man such as Mr. Shepley, whoever he may be, can go down to the State Department and say, "Give $100,000 for this purpose."

I know I tried to get money for students who were to come from Egypt, and we secured only part of the funds requested. I could not do it. This occurred last year, and it was an effort in which our present Ambassador was extremely interested. The Department did not have enough money. How in the world can Mr. Shepley go down to the State Department and within a few days get $100,000 for this purpose?

Mr. SCOTT. If the Senator from Arkansas will permit, it is quite possible that the junior Senator from Pennsylvania has been more modest than perhaps he should have been with regard to his own part in this matter. I take it that the Senator from Arkansas knows the junior Senator from Pennsylvania. The junior Senator from Pennsylvania stated that he met with Mr. Shepley, an official of the Vice President's office. If the Senator from Arkansas wishes to know who pays him or whether his name appears on a Senate payroll he can send for whatever record there is. I do not know. But I do know that Mr. Shepley, as an official of the Vice President's office, met with me, and that that meeting occurred, to the best of my recollection, in either late June or very early July.

As a result of that meeting, I made certain representations to the Department of State. Mr. Shepley made certain representations to the Department of State. During all of that time, up until this weekend, the Senator from Pennsylvania had heard nothing whatever of any interest on the part of the Kennedy Foundation in this matter. The Senator from Pennsylvania asserts that in his judgment, any interest of the Kennedy Foundation in regard to the amount involved, $100,000, comes after the State Department had made its decision, and that this Foundation was not heard from by the Senator from Pennsylvania until this weekend, except as to the $5,000 to which I referred.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. Does the Senator from Pennsylvania question the accuracy of the Satterthwaite letter rejecting this application?

Mr. SCOTT. I understand from what the Senator from Arkansas says that the letter was written last June or last July.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. July 7.

Mr. SCOTT. I have told the Senator that is about the time the junior Senator from Pennsylvania interested himself in this subject. I am very happy that if the Senator from Pennsylvania intervened, he had more persuasiveness than others who may have intervened earlier. The Senator does not apologize for the fact that he may have been very useful in securing the agreement for this transportation cost.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. I may have misunderstood the Senator.

Mr. SCOTT. I am sure the Senator from Arkansas is not anxious to misunderstand.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. I thought it was Mr. Shepley who got the money. Now it appears that the Senator from Pennsylvania was the one who got the money. I did not know of the Senator's deep interest in the exchange program. I am glad to hear it, and I hope we shall get some support when the appropriation comes before the Senate, because every year this appropriation has met with difficulty in obtaining even Budget Bureau interest.

Mr. SCOTT. I will say to the Senator from Arkansas my support of the appropriation of this nature has been as consistent, and at least as good as the record of the Senator from Arkansas, whose record I commend. If I may say so for the benefit of the Senator from Arkansas, I referred to the fact that I had mentioned some of these questions in this statement. My statement has been handed to me again.

My statement said:

> Last Saturday morning James Shepley of the Vice President's office called Jackie Robinson in New York—

And so forth. I did identify the person.

FAIR LABOR STANDARDS AMENDMENTS OF 1960

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 3758) to amend the Fair Labor Standards Act of 1938, as amended, to provide coverage of employees of large enterprises engaged in retail trade or service and of other employers engaged in activities affecting commerce, to increase the minimum wage under the act to $1.25 an hour, and for other purposes.

VICE PRESIDENT NIXON'S POLICY DECISIONS

Mr. McGEE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD immediately preceding the discussion on the agreement to limit debate an article entitled "NIXON Meets Advisers—Plans To Issue Papers," written by Laurence M. Stern, and published in the Washington Post of today, August 17, 1960. I make the request with the thought that perhaps this item will be germane to the question raised by the Senator from Arkansas in his discussion with the Senator from Pennsylvania.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

NIXON MEETS ADVISERS—PLANS TO ISSUE PAPERS

(By Laurence M. Stern)

Vice President RICHARD M. NIXON met with some of his top policy idea men yesterday to discuss his position on a wide range of issues.

When he emerged from the 2½-hour, closed-door talk in the Mayflower Hotel, the Vice President said he intends to set out his views in depth through the medium of written papers.

Mr. NIXON's council of advisors bears a distinctively egghead stamp. The group with which he met included 10 college presidents or professors as against 6 businessmen.

Moving on another front, Nixon forces announced formation of a "celebrities for Nixon committee" which was launched at the Capitol yesterday with Hollywoodlike fanfare. Its cast of 30 film, theater, and sports-world figures will be expanded, as one Nixon strategist put it, to include hundreds of headline personalities.

ANYONE CAN JOIN

"Anyone who thinks he's a celebrity can join the group," explained NIXON'S press secretary, Herbert G. Klein.

In making his two-pronged foray into intellectual and entertainment circles, Mr. NIXON appeared to be emulating his Democratic rival for the Presidency, Senator JOHN F. KENNEDY, Democrat, of Massachusetts. The Bay State Democrat has surrounded himself, on the one hand, with a battery of academic advisers and, on the other, with such Hollywood eminences as singer Frank Sinatra and actor Peter Lawford, Senator KENNEDY'S brother-in-law.

Describing Mr. NIXON'S meeting yesterday with his policy advisers, the Vice President's policy and issues adviser James R. Shepley said "there was an exchange of ideas on any issue that came to mind. It was completely informal."

Without going into details, Shepley said "there were some glimmers of new ideas" produced at the session which "will require further exploration before they become part of the Vice President's position."

PRACTICE FOLLOWED BY ADLAI

Although Nixon aids described the candidate's plan to use position papers as a "new technique," the practice was followed by Adlai Stevenson in his 1956 presidential campaign.

Mr. NIXON expects to issue his first policy paper dealing with communism as a philosophy on Thursday. "It will discuss communism as a social philosophy, its economic methods, political methods and legal system," Shepley said.

Shepley, who is on loan to the Vice President from Time magazine, said NIXON first met with the policy advisory group several months ago and has been in touch with members individually since then. Its current membership is 19, but 3 were absent yesterday.

"He's on the prowl for original ideas," Shepley added.

The blue-ribbon advisory group is not Mr. NIXON'S only source of policy guidance. He has been consulting with many members of the Eisenhower Cabinet in deciding his position on issues.

VISITS GREENSBORO TODAY

NIXON followed up his policy meeting yesterday with a campaign rally today into Greensboro, N.C., for an ice skating and coffee evening with Pat and DICK.

Members of his policy advisory group, as released by Nixon headquarters, are as follows:

Henry Ahlgren, director of the University of Wisconsin Agricultural Extension School; Henry G. Alexander, New York banker; John E. Burchard, dean of the School of Humanities and Social Sciences, Massachusetts Institute of Technology; Arthur W. Burns, professor of economics, Columbia University; Paul W. Cherington, School of Business Administration, Harvard University.

Also, William Elliott, professor of government, Harvard University; Marion B. Folsom, director and former president, Eastman Kodak Co.; William C. Foster, former director, Economic Cooperation Administration; Don Fuller, professor of jurisprudence, Harvard Law School; John A. Hannah, president of Michigan State University; Dr. John T. Heller, director of the New England Institution of Medical Research.

Also Joseph Kaplan, professor of physics, University of California at Los Angeles; Lawrence Kimpton, chancellor of the University of Chicago; Charles Percy, president of Bell & Howell; Gen. David Sarnoff, board chairman of Radio Corp. of America; Dr. Leonard Scheele, former U.S. Surgeon General; Robert C. Sprague, president of Sprague Electric; Dr. Philip W. Thayer, dean of the School of Advanced Studies, Johns Hopkins University and Millard Roberts, president of Parsons College, Iowa.

UNANIMOUS-CONSENT AGREEMENT TO LIMIT DEBATE ON AMENDMENTS TO THE FAIR LABOR STANDARDS ACT

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I am informed by the minority leader that he believes our unanimous-consent request should be renewed. I now renew the request made earlier. I ask unanimous consent that the Senate have no more rollcalls today; that when it concludes its deliberations today it recess until 10 o'clock tomorrow morning; that at 11 o'clock tomorrow morning——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. FREAR in the chair). The Senate will be in order. Senators who are interested in the unanimous-consent agreement are asked to pay attention.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. That beginning at 11 o'clock the Senate operate under controlled time, not to exceed an hour on any amendment or amendments thereto; with 2 hours on the Monroney amendment or substitute, in whichever form it may be; and 2 hours on the Prouty amendment, or substitute, in whichever form it may be offered.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. Reserving the right to object, suppose a substitute amendment were offered. What time would be accorded to such an amendment?

Mr. DIRKSEN. I suggest to the majority leader that if it is a bona fide substitute, which proposes to strike out all after the enacting clause and insert new language, it is certainly more than an amendment and should be treated accordingly.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I shall be glad, if there is any Senator who contemplates offering a substitute, and will say so, to include that in the request.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. The Senator from South Dakota did not contemplate offering such a substitute. He is making the inquiry in behalf of another Senator.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Any Senator.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. Certain Senators have urged me to object to the request unless it is broadened to permit 2 hours of debate for any bona fide substitute which proposes to strike out all after the enacting clause and substitute another proposal.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I have no objection to modifying the request with respect to any bona fide substitute. I would not want it used as a vehicle for a filibuster or for preventing votes, or for delaying the Senate for another day, when it could get through. However, I am willing to modify my proposal in accordance with the suggestion of the Senator from South Dakota.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the agreement is entered into.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. It is understood that it is under the usual form.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Under the usual form.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. Reserving the right to object——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The agreement has been entered into.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. But the Chair added a condition which was not in the request, when the Chair said "under the usual form." Does that mean that an amendment which is not germane to the text will not be allowed? That was not stated in the request. The Chair added it, and the Senator from South Dakota objects to that addition by the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair has made the announcement.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. I appeal from the decision of the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair has made the announcement. The Senator from South Dakota may contest it.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. The Senator from South Dakota appeals from the decision of the Chair.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, who has the floor?

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. I trust that the Senator from South Dakota has been recognized.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, will the Senator from South Dakota yield?

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. I yield.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. In my original request—I do not know whether the Senator from South Dakota was here at the time—I made it clear that the agreement was in accordance with the routine form which is reduced to writing, and when I renewed my request a moment ago I made it clear that I was renewing the request previously made.

I submit the record will show that to be the case. It is in accordance with the usual form. We do not spell out these long requests. It is very clear that I did it originally, and that then I merely renewed the request which I had previously made. When the Chair did not announce that it was in accordance with the usual form, I wished to call to the attention of all Senators that I had intended it that way. That is the way I originally had made it, and I was merely renewing that request.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. The Senator from South Dakota does not see in the Chamber the Senator who asked to be protected. A Senator earlier showed me an amendment which he intended to offer and which, in my judgment, would not be germane under a strict interpretation of germaneness. I believe it is related, but it might be interpreted otherwise.

The Senator from South Dakota was seeking to protect the Senator so that he might offer his amendment. When the Chair stated the request, the Senator from South Dakota did not hear any statement which would have precluded offering an amendment which might not be considered germane. It was on that basis that I withheld my objection.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I submit that we are perfectly in order now. I do not have any objection to the Senator contesting the ruling of the Chair. On the other hand, I do not desire to foreclose any Senator from offering an amendment.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. I assume my appeal is pending. If it can be agreed that the amendment to which I have referred may be offered—and I believe both leaders are familiar with it——

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I have no objection to making an exception with respect to the Curtis price-support amendment.

Mr. KEATING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Vermont has the floor. An appeal of the Senator from South Dakota is pending.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. I have an appeal pending from the decision of the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That is correct.

Mr. KEATING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. PROUTY. I yield to the Senator from New York.

Mr. KEATING. We must be extremely careful, in these rather hectic days, in agreeing to unanimous-consent requests. I therefore ask the distinguished majority leader, when he makes any request for a limitation of time—to which I am entirely agreeable—whether he intends to have incorporated in it the provision that only germane amendments may be offered. Otherwise it might well be that other amendments not germane to the subject matter before us could be offered, but with respect to which the Senator offering the amendment might be perfectly willing to agree to a limitation on debate.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I can speak only with respect to the consent agreement now under discussion, and which has been entered into. When I proposed it I asked that it be in accordance with the unanimous consent form that is usually followed, with regard to motions and appeals and the allotment of time, and so forth, because it takes a good deal of the time of the Senate to read it. Every Senator has heard it time and time again. Many times it takes a long time to state it. I stated originally that I wanted it to be in accordance with the usual unanimous-consent form. That request was objected to. That statement is in the RECORD. The minority leader then came to me and asked that I renew the request. I told him that he had problems on his side of the aisle and that he should make sure that he has touched all the bases, because I did not want to go through the kind of harassment which is now taking place.

He assured me that that had been done, and that a satisfactory adjustment had been reached. At his request I renewed my unanimous-consent request. At the suggestion of a Senator I have modified it. I merely wish to call attention to the fact—particularly for the benefit of the Senators who were not here when I made the original request—that the original request was in accordance with the usual unanimous-consent form.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. I believe the question could be quickly resolved if we were to have unanimous consent that the particular amendment I have in mind might be offered.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I will modify the request accordingly.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. It is the amendment which deals with price supports.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I will modify my agreement entered into, if no objection is raised.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will state the request if identification of the amendment is made.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I ask unanimous consent that the Curtis price support amendment be excepted from the provision of germaneness in the agreement previously entered into.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the agreement is entered.

The unanimous-consent agreement was subsequently reduced to writing, as follows:

UNANIMOUS-CONSENT AGREEMENT

Ordered, That, effective on tomorrow (Thursday, August 18, 1960), at the hour of 11 o'clock a.m., during the further consideration of the bill S. 3758, the Fair Labor Standards Amendments Act of 1960, debate on any amendment or amendment thereto (except a bona fide substitute for the bill, upon which there shall be a limitation of 2 hours), shall be limited to 1 hour, to be equally divided and controlled by the mover of any such amendment and the majority leader: Provided, That in the event the majority leader is in favor of any such amendment the time in opposition thereto shall be controlled by the minority leader or some Senator designated by him: Provided further, That no amendment that is not germane to the provisions of the said bill shall be received, with the exception of the so-called Curtis price control amendment, if offered.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. I thank the majority leader.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair thanks the Senator from South Dakota.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. Mr. President, it is understood that I withdraw my appeal.

IMPORTS OF LAMB

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, many Oregon lamb producers have brought to my attention the difficulties faced by the industry as a result of the importation of lambs into this country from other areas and especially Australia.

Mr. President, Mr. A. G. Horton, of Route 1, Box 205, Monmouth, Oreg., has brought to my attention the difficulties that he, as a producer, has faced because of lower prices, together with two newspaper articles, the first from the Oregonian and the second from the Capital Press of August 10 and 12, respectively, concerning the prices received by Oregon sheep raisers.

I ask unanimous consent that the letter and the newspaper clippings to which I have alluded be printed at this point in my remarks.

There being no objection, the letter and articles were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

MONMOUTH, OREG., August 12, 1960.

Senator WAYNE MORSE,
Senate Office Building,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR SIR: In regards to lamb, I wrote you earlier in the year, prior to lamb marketing season in the mid Willamette Valley, that we in the sheep business were concerned about the prospects of lower fat lamb prices due to lamb imports.

Now we have lived through the lower fat lamb prices; lower on this ranch by $1,000 from last year. I should like to again call your attention to the fact that our prices received for our lambs are going lower, not by prediction but by imports. Without detail, we have an economical unit, high-use factor from our land, for our sheep and seed production. We cannot cope with the import problem on this ranch, it has to come from Washington. The woolgrowers are again seeking to put it on the Tariff Commission to consider the lamb import problem. Again I ask you to increase your endeavor to help the lamb producer, in the United States of America.

Sincerely,

ALAN G. HORTON.

SHEEP SALE PRICES DOWN—CLATSKANIE MAN BUYS TOP $590

ALBANY.—A buyer paid $590 for a sheep at the 20th annual Willamette Valley ram sale here but otherwise prices offered for 167 rams and ewes were substantially lower than those paid at last year's sale.

The top bid was made by Richard Magruder, Clatskanie, buying for his neighbor Bib W. Ellis, for a registered Hampshire stud ram consigned by C. M. Hubbard & Son of Junction City. Only Oregon-grown sheep were admitted to the sale.

Even this high was below last year's $725 paid for a Suffolk ram.

Average price paid for rams was $91.11 per animal, in contrast with the 1959 average of $117.03. Ewes at the 1960 sale brought an average of $54.71 which was $4.34 under the 1959 average.

Due largely to Ellis' purchase the Hampshire breed brought the highest average prices at $116.91 among 10 breeds represented.

Biggest single check was $750, given by Lester Mealey, Lebanon, in payment for 13 animals of various breeds purchased by himself and four children, Harold, Norman, Jerry and Sarah. Ranking next was $610 paid by Cunningham Sheep Co. of Pendleton for seven Lincolns.

The sale was held Saturday at the Linn County fairgrounds under sponsorship of the Oregon Purebred Sheep Breeders' Association. Auctioneer was Howard Brown of Woodland, Calif. Claude Steusloff, Salem, was manager.

Association officials said prices at all sheep auctions held in Oregon this year have fallen below those last year, due, they said, to a slump in market lamb prices.

RAMS SELL LOW—DEMAND SLOW AT ALBANY SALE

(By Claude Steusloff)

Buyers got solid values at the 20th annual Willamette Valley ram sale in Albany last Saturday as 170 rams sold sharply lower for an average of $91.32.

This compares with the sale average of $117 last year and reflects current fat lamb quotations 4–5 cents per pound below the 1959 prices.

Demand was particularly slow for Suffolk and Hampshire rams which moved through the ring cheaper by $40–$45 per head than they did under active trade at last year's sale.

Only 2 of the rams went to new homes out of Oregon in contrast to 29 which went out of State last year.

MONTANA, CALIFORNIA

Montana State University at Missoula paid $250 for a Hampshire stud ram consigned by R. W. Hogg & Sons, Salem. A Romney stud going to D. N. Gould of Hyderville, Calif., cleared the ring at $105.

The top price paid at the sale was $590, for a Hampshire ram. The buyer was Bob W. Ellis of Clatskanie and the consignor was C. M. Hubbard & Son of Junction City.

Top individual sales of rams in other breeds included: Suffolk, consignor Gerald Flanagan, Junction City, $390 to Chauncey Hubbard, Junction City. Romney, consignor Murris Clover, Cottage Grove, $200 to John Lindow, Independence. Cheviot, consignor Don Kessi, Harland, $120. Southdown, consignor Claude Steusloff, Salem, $115 to Roger Hamlin, Corvallis. Lincoln, consignor Kenneth McCrae, Monmouth, $110 to Cunningham Sheep Co., Pendleton. Columbia, consignor E. J. Handley, McMinnville, $95. Shropshire, consignor D. W. Chambers, Salem, $80. Corriedale, consignor J. G. Kassner, Oregon City, $65.

CUNNINGHAM BIGGEST

The largest individual buyer of the sale was Cunningham Sheep Co. of Pendleton, which purchased most of the 16 Lincoln rams offered. Jerry and Norman Maley, Redmond FFA boys, bought all six of the Southdown ewes which went through the ring.

A total of 26 ewes traded hands for an average of $55, only $4 lower than last year. They included one Romney for $80; six Southdowns averaging $70; eight Suffolks averaging $51; six Hampshires $50; one Shropshire for $45; three Cheviots averaging $43, and one Columbia for $42.50.

Sale summary by breeds: 46 Suffolk rams, $120 average, $45 lower than in 1959; 34 Hampshire rams, $117 average, $40 lower; 4 Cheviot rams, $86 average, $11 higher; 24 Romney rams, $81 average, $11 lower; 6 Lincoln rams, $78 average, $27 lower; 6 Columbia rams, $60 average, $24 lower; 15 Southdowns, $55 average, $8 lower; 4 Corriedales, $54 average, $39 lower; 11 Shropshires, $50 average, $24 lower.

Total income of the sale, which is conducted by the Oregon Purebred Sheepbreeders Association, was $16,955.

O. E. Mikesell, Linn County agent who has served as secretary of the event since its inception in 1941, was presented with a piece of luggage during the noon break, in appreciation of his work on the sale program.

RESEEDING AND REFENCING OF BURNED-OVER TIMBER LANDS

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, in my testimony before the Senate Appropriations Committee in support of a supplemental appropriation for the reseeding and refencing of burned-over range and timber lands last Thursday, I indicated my hope that in choosing suitable seed for this purpose, the Bureau of Land Management would not overlook suitable Oregon-grown seed which is in large supply.

Today I wish to document this portion of my testimony by bringing to the attention of the Senate a release from the Oregon Crop and Livestock Reporting Service dated August 8, 1960, which has just been received, and which states that, among other seeds in significantly higher supply than last year, are the fescues.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the report to which I have alluded be printed at this point in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the report was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

DEALER CARRYOVER GENERALLY BELOW LAST YEAR BUT TOTAL STOCKS ONE-EIGHTH LARGER

Carryover stock of 41 kinds, groups and strains of field seeds held by wholesalers and large retail dealers throughout the Nation on June 30, 1960, totaled 188 million pounds, according to the Oregon Crop and Livestock Reporting Service. These holdings were 12 percent larger than last year's total of 167 million pounds, mostly because of sharp increases in ryegrass, timothy, red clover, sweetclover, Austrian winter peas, lupine, red fescue, and Chewings fescue.

Stocks were smaller than last year for 22 items and larger for 19. The most notable declines, 20 percent or more below last year, occurred for tall fescue, wheatgrasses, wild winter peas, Kentucky bluegrass, smooth bromegrass, Bermuda grass, Sudangrass, bentgrass, vetch, and ladino clover. Stocks of certified and noncertified alfalfa seed totaling, 32.8 million pounds were down 12 percent and the lowest in 8 years. Birdsfoot trefoil was down 7 percent and white (dutch) clover, orchardgrass and alsike clover were down 3, 2, and 1 percent, respectively.

Largest increases in dealers' June 30, 1960, stocks compared with a year earlier were reported for lupine and Dallis grass, both more than seven times larger. Timothy totaling 10 million pounds represented nearly a sixfold increase, and common ryegrass, at 37.1 million pounds, was three times last year's small holdings and the largest of record. Other seeds for which stocks were significantly larger, one and one-half to three time larger, included other lespedeza (mostly Sericea), Kobe lespedeza, meadow fescue, Austrian winter peas, Chewings fescue, redtop, and Merion Kentucky bluegrass. Stocks of red fescue were up 47 percent from last year and at 5.8 million pounds were at an alltime high. Red clover at 14.7 million pounds was up 38 percent over last year and the highest in 6 years. Sweet clover was up 28 percent and the highest in 4 years. Holdings of old-crop crimson clover seed were up 27 percent and perennial ryegrass was up 9 percent.

All wholesalers, large retailers, country shippers and others who have been known to carry commercial quantities of field seeds in the past are included in the current survey. The carryover statistics for 1960 have essentially the same degree of national coverage as those for 1959 and previous years. The Department of Agriculture wishes to acknowledge the cooperative efforts of the seed industry in reporting June 30 inventory figures. For the fourth consecutive year, no commercial stocks, exclusive of foundation seed, were held by the Government.

In addition to the dealer stocks shown in accompanying table, significant quantities of old seed were stored by growers in dealers' warehouses, especially alfalfa, red clover, alsike clover and ryegrass. Stocks of grower-owned seed are given in each of the production forecast reports issued during the year.

RESEEDING OF BURNED-OVER FOREST LANDS

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the body of the RECORD a statement I submitted to the Senate Committee on Appropriations on August 15, 1960, in support of appropriations for range reseeding on forest lands.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

STATEMENT OF SENATOR WAYNE MORSE, OF OREGON, BEFORE SENATE APPROPRIATIONS COMMITTEE ON RESEEDING OF BURNED-OVER FOREST LAND, AUGUST 15, 1960

Mr. Chairman and members of the committee, today I wish to supplement my statement of August 11 by indicating my strong support of the Forest Service request for $1.3 million with which to provide funds for emergency reforestation and range reseeding on forest lands. These additional funds are needed to cope with the disastrous fires which have destroyed thousands of acres of natural resources in our Nation this summer.

No one knows better than I how you and your committee have worked the last 6 years to provide the full amounts needed for sound forest and range development. We have shared disappointment that your efforts have not had the full support of the executive branch although detailed information has been submitted previously showing the need that exists.

You have been especially alert to the reforestation and reseeding needs on our public lands. Were it not for your efforts we would have had the lowest rate of progress during this administration than any other since the turn of the century.

This year you took the lead again advancing the concept that special funds should be provided for reforesting and reseeding at once land burned in the current year. You also restored the $481,000 cut proposed by the Secretary of the Interior in soil and moisture funds—a program for which he now asks increases.

Certainly all conservationists must recognize the dedication you and your committee have demonstrated for the cause of conservation.

I urge your committee to grant not only the special funds requested by the Forest Service, but to provide the full amount of money needed to bring the forest and range programs of the Forest Service and the Bureau of Land Management up to desired levels of operation. It is my hope that in so doing we may find, belatedly, that this administration will at last be willing to support a proper program of conservation.

Again, as in my testimony before you in behalf of the supplemental appropriation requested by the Bureau of Land Management, I express my strong hope that the agency in utilizing these funds will not overlook suitable varieties of Oregon-grown seeds, especially the fescues which are in significantly higher supply than last year. It is my understanding that the fescue seed supplies are 1½ to 3 times larger than last year.

ACHIEVEMENTS OF SERVICEMEN

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, I am sure each Senator receives, as I do, many letters from servicemen outlining serious problems for which they request Senate assistance. I am, of course, very happy—as I am sure every Senator is—to be of such assistance as I can in these matters.

However, occasionally letters are received concerning the achievements of servicemen. Such a letter was recently received from Col. Charles A. Allard, airbase commander of the Mountain Home Air Force Base in Idaho. Colonel Allard brought to my attention the outstanding record of A2c James R. Hiebert, of Eugene, Oreg.

Mr. President, I should like to salute the accomplishment of Airman Hiebert and, in so doing, to pay tribute to the thousands of young Americans such as James who are serving with distinction in our Armed Forces. Each of them is a credit to his country.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that relevant portions of Colonel Allard's letter be printed at this point in my remarks.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

HEADQUARTERS, 9TH BOMBARDMENT WING, MEDIUM (SAC), U.S. AIR FORCE, Mountain Home Air Force Base, Idaho.

Hon. WAYNE MORSE,
U.S. Senate,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR SENATOR MORSE: A2c James R. Hiebert, from the State of Oregon, has been selected from the 9th Combat Defense Squadron for special recognition. Airman Hiebert is the son of Mr. and Mrs. Arthur P. Hiebert, 2070 Grant Street, Eugene, Oreg., and was selected as Security Airman of the Month of the squadron for June 1960.

This airman has demonstrated great devotion to duty and his country and has performed in an exemplary manner. He is clearly outstanding among all the men assigned to this base and is the type of man who will continue to be a good citizen and leader in our country whether or not he remains in the military service.

Sincerely,

CHARLES A. ALLARD,
Colonel, USAF,
Airbase Commander.

USE OF KENNEDY FOUNDATION MONEY TO "OUTBID" THE GOVERNMENT OF THE UNITED STATES

Mr. COOPER. Mr. President, will the Senator from Vermont yield without losing the floor?

Mr. PROUTY. I yield to the Senator from Kentucky.

Mr. COOPER. Mr. President, perhaps I would be wiser not to say what I am about to say. I believe it was inevitable that when we returned for this session, before the election, it would be impossible to escape in the Senate the political overtones and undertones and political implications of the presidential campaign.

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. President, may we have order, please?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair is cognizant that there is talking on the floor by Members of this body.

The Senator from Kentucky may proceed.

Mr. COOPER. Mr. President, so far as I am concerned, it would have been much better if we had never had this special session, or, at least, if upon our return we had limited ourselves to passing the appropriation bills and allowed the next administration and the next Congress to take care of the difficult and far-reaching subjects before us.

Nevertheless, we are here. It is impossible to avoid questions which are not related to the business before us. We can only do our best. I am not here to tell anyone else what he ought to do. However, I believe the subject which we had before us a short time ago, and I have no substantive comments on it, is not a proper subject for the Senate in this politically charged session. We cannot escape politics, and I have no doubt that Senators from each party are trying to make the most of this session for their own party. I say this for myself, because each one of us has his responsibility as a Senator. I believe personal matters ought not to be brought into this body while we are here. We will do well to finish our work here quickly and adjourn.

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. President, will the Senator from Vermont yield?

Mr. PROUTY. I yield.

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. President, I commend the Senator from Kentucky for what he has just said. I, too, am distressed and disturbed at what occurred here this evening. There is a limit to how far politics should go. There are certain limits which should be observed.

I can recall, offhand, that certain prominent Republicans, on the eve of a particular campaign, acting through a foundation, made a grant to a religious order. I do not recall that any Democrats raised the issue at that time.

I hope that this is the last we will hear of this kind of politics. There are too many things in which we should be interested as Senators and as Americans. We ought to be planning for today and tomorrow, rather than discussing picayunish policies, which could harm this body and make it look foolish, indeed.

Mr. McCARTHY. Mr. President, I make the observation that the special provisions in the Internal Revenue Code with regard to the treatment of revenue foundations were drawn after very careful consideration. Briefly, the argument was that in the United States we wanted to encourage individuals and organizations of individuals to take care of some of the special social and cultural problems which face the country. These provisions in the law were designed for that purpose.

The Kennedy Foundation, the Rockefeller Foundation, and other similar foundations have been organized under the laws of the land. They operate under the supervision of the Internal Revenue Service.

In my opinion, the junior Senator from Pennsylvania has cast a cloud over the operation of every charitable foundation organized in this country. Are we to question the Kennedy Foundation if it makes a grant for a hospital for retarded children? Is that to be called, on the floor of the Senate, a political act? Are we to stand silently by while the junior Senator from Pennsylvania makes a charge of that kind against the Kennedy Foundation?

The Senator from Montana [Mr. MANSFIELD] referred to a grant of $1,600,000 made by the Rockefeller Foundation to a hospital in New York conducted by an organization of Catholic nuns. As the Senator said, no Democrat rose in the Senate and said that was politics. Should not such a grant have been made? Was it to be interpreted as an action on the part of the Rockefellers to win an election in New York?

I should like to ask the Senator from New York, who is on the floor, whether he interpreted it in that way?

Mr. JAVITS. I should like to have the Senator from Minnesota yield to me, if he will.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. MANSFIELD in the chair). Does the Senator from Minnesota yield to the Senator from New York?

Mr. McCARTHY. I am glad to yield to the Senator from New York.

Mr. JAVITS. On this subject let me say that I think the character and the probity of the Rockefellers have withstood the tests of time and of political controversies, and have done so very ably; and I think that is true of many other foundations.

Mr. McCARTHY. I agree.

Mr. JAVITS. For myself, I must say that every Senator must decide what he thinks important as a political point, and I respect and honor his right to make it.

I must say I heard with great sympathy the words of the Senator from Kentucky, and I would subscribe to those words.

I would not wish to bruit the matter further by speaking on it myself, and I had no intention of participating in the discussion.

But the Senator is my brother in this body, as well as my colleague; and he asked me an honest question, and I have given him an honest answer.

I am really sorry the whole thing blew up as it did. But it did, and the public will have to decide what are the merits. But I hope it will not be extended in any way.

The people are not children. They understand this is a tense time, and that the two presidential candidates are Senator KENNEDY and Vice President NIXON, and that there are great issues in terms of their candidacies; and that puts the issue discussed here in a certain different position.

But I hope my colleague will not make the matter worse by drawing analogies. I do not favor this. I deprecate it.

I hope the Senater will help me—as I am trying now to do—put into focus the fact that good deeds have been done; and let us not include things that would make people unhappy and would vitiate them.

Mr. McCARTHY. I thank the Senator from New York.

Mr. President, I shall not pass judgment; but I think every Senator should take heed of the action today.

Many Senators remember the time, 6 or 8 years ago, when certain actions began here, and when it was said, "Let the people decide." But that situation got out of hand before the people could decide, and I think every Senator knows what had to be done about it.

So I say that when charges that are not substantiated are made, I intend to sound the warning; and I intend to do it every step of the way, if the Senator from Pennsylvania continues this attack. This is nothing new; this action has been going on in other fields; and I think every Senator has the responsibility to take action on it in the beginning, and not to take the view, "Let the people decide."

Mr. MONRONEY. Mr. President, will the Senator from Minnesota yield?

Mr. McCARTHY. I yield.

Mr. MONRONEY. I agree with the Senator; and I suggest that since the Republicans have a truth squad to follow President Truman, we need a watchdog squad in connection with statements slipped into the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, so as to have any statements which might be damaging to our party read on the floor of the Senate, where they can be challenged.

So I hope Senators will be here to object to any matters offered for the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD that would smear, or when any attempt is made in secrecy to submit items to be "shoved" into the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD which contain any derogatory remarks about any Senator or any candidate, whether Republican or Democratic.

We do not believe in that sort of thing; and I think it is a shame that the great party of Abraham Lincoln seems to indulge in such attacks by "sliding" statements into the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD without letting anyone else know what is going on.

Mr. McCARTHY. I do not think we can say the Republicans have endorsed this action yet. I think it is important that some of them indicate whether they approve it.

I recall that in 1952, in that campaign, the Republican candidate said "The only difference between me and this particular person is one of methods. Our objectives are the same, and methods are not important."

I say that if that is the case, let us act to save democracy, because methods are all important.

Mr. McGEE. Mr. President, will the Senator from Minnesota yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. BURDICK in the chair). Does the Senator from Minnesota yield to the Senator from Wyoming?

Mr. McCARTHY. I yield.

Mr. McGEE. I wish to commend the Senator for bringing into focus what I regard as a very critical question which should be cleared up now in this campaign.

The Vice President made a distinguished statement when he said this campaign should be fought on issues, and that he intended to take the high road. I believe we have had an exhibit here, tonight, that will enable the Vice President to make his position clear. Does he support this attack? Is it a part of the campaign? Or does he repudiate it and denounce it as a campaign tactic?

I wish to commend the Senator from New York, because I think his intentions and his interests are the same as ours. But that is all the more reason why such things should be cut out now. Certainly that is imperative.

We are interested in honest, sincere issues, not in any attack or attempt to tear down or to question motives or to attack the reputation of honorable groups in the country.

Mr. MONRONEY. Mr. President, if the Senator will yield, let me say I think it would be interesting to know whether Mr. Shepley, who was borrowed from Time, Life, and Fortune, acted in an attempt to have action taken by the State Department ahead of the other group's action. I think it important to know whether this is an accidental happening or whether it is part of a particular program to have public money spent when foundation money might be available to do the same job.

Mr. McGEE. And I serve notice that I intend to give the Vice President an opportunity to take a stand on this question when he returns to town. I think when he returns he should have that opportunity, in order to declare his position and either to endorse or to repudiate the use of such a tactic in the campaign.

SOUTH DAKOTA POLL: NIXON FAVORED 2 TO 1—MUNDT AHEAD

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. Mr. President, I desire to make an insertion in the RECORD, and I do not know whether there will be much comfort in it for the Democrats. But I assure each one of them that the matter to which I refer does not smear or slander in any way. It is a report entitled "South Dakota Poll: NIXON Favored Nearly 2 to 1—MUNDT Ahead."

I am perfectly willing to read the entire statement into the RECORD; but I wonder whether I can, instead, submit it and request that it be printed in the RECORD, and then let Senators read it there for themselves.

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. President, I shall not object to such a request. I wish to say that I think the Senator from South Dakota is taking the high road and is to be commended. I have no desire to have the article to which he has referred read to the Senate at this time, because I think it is bad news, so far as the Democrats are concerned. [Laughter.]

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. Then, Mr. President, I offer the report for the RECORD, and ask that it be printed therein.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

SOUTH DAKOTA POLL: NIXON FAVORED NEARLY 2 TO 1—MUNDT AHEAD

Vice President RICHARD M. NIXON is favored over Senator JOHN F. KENNEDY for the presidency nearly 2 to 1 among South Dakotans.

In the first sampling of State opinion since the national party conventions, the South Dakota poll also reports a loss of Democratic strength in the gubernatorial and senatorial races.

In the Senate contest Republican incumbent KARL MUNDT has taken a 5-percentage-point lead over his Democratic opponent, Representative GEORGE MCGOVERN. Just prior to the conventions MCGOVERN enjoyed a 9-point majority.

The only Democrat substantially improving his position over previous samplings is West River congressional candidate W. H. Raff, whose strength in cities and towns more than offset the rural advantage of Republican incumbent E. Y. BERRY. With 7.3 percent undecided, West River respondents now give Raff 50.9 percent support, compared with BERRY's 41.8 percent.

In the First (East River) District congressional race, Republican Ben Reifel and Democrat Ray Fitzgerald lost slightly because of a large undecided vote but maintained approximately their relative positions.

PRESIDENTIAL RACE

The Vice President's strength has increased strikingly since the last preconvention test against Senator KENNEDY.

Respondents were asked, "If the November election were held today, for which ticket would you vote for President and Vice President?" A tabulation indicates a strong and rather uniform support for the Nixon-Lodge ticket:

	Farm	City	Town	Total
Nixon-Lodge (Republican)	58.5	64.1	63.6	61.4
Kennedy-Johnson (Democrat)	31.7	30.8	33.4	31.7
Undecided	9.8	5.1	3.0	6.9

Prior to the conventions NIXON was supported by 45.2 percent compared with KENNEDY's 41.7 percent, with 13.1 percent undecided.

SENATE RACE

Accompanying the strong showing for the Republican presidential ticket has been a strengthening of support for Senator KARL MUNDT in his bid to succeed himself. As indicated by the following table (which excludes 3.1 percent undecided votes), MUNDT is ahead of Congressman MCGOVERN for the first time since the poll began sampling their relative strength 20 months ago.

	January 1959	January 1960	July 6 1960	Today
Mundt (Republican)	45.6	48.0	45.5	52.5
McGovern (Democrat)	54.4	52.0	54.5	47.5

A breakdown by residence indicates that MCGOVERN carries the rural areas, while MUNDT has a majority of town and city dwellers in his column:

	Farm	City	Town	Total
Mundt	41.5	62.2	61.8	52.5
McGovern	58.5	37.8	38.2	47.5

GUBERNATORIAL RACE

Gov. Ralph Herseth continues to hold a sizable if decreased, lead over Republican candidate Archie Gubbrud, with a substantial number of respondents undecided:

	Farm	City	Town	Total
Herseth (Democrat)	58.5	51.3	45.7	53.6
Gubbrud (Republican)	36.6	33.4	48.6	37.9
Undecided	4.9	15.3	5.7	8.5

Gubbrud has cut 9 percentage points from the 25 which separated the two men in the July 6 report. The totals then were: Herseth, 57.6; Gubbrud, 32.6; undecided, 9.8.

FIRST CONGRESSIONAL DISTRICT

With 17 percent of respondents undecided, neither candidate for the House of Representatives from the East River district has a majority of support. The percentage point spread between Reifel and Fitzgerald has narrowed slightly (1.4 points) since the July sampling. Current figures are:

	Farm	City	Town	Total
Reifel (Republican)	33.3	58.6	62.5	47.6
Fitzgerald (Democrat)	50.0	20.7	25.0	35.2
Undecided	16.7	20.7	12.5	17.2

July totals for the First District race were: Reifel, 51.4; Fitzgerald, 37.6; undecided, 11.0.

FAIR LABOR STANDARDS AMENDMENTS OF 1960

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 3758) to amend the Fair Labor Standards Act of 1938, as amended, to provide coverage of employees of large enterprises engaged in retail trade or service and of other employers engaged in activities affecting commerce, to increase the minimum wage under the act to $1.25 an hour, and for other purposes.

Mr. CARROLL. Mr. President, who has the floor?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Vermont has the floor.

Mr. PROUTY. Mr. President, I submit my proposed amendment to S. 3758 and ask that it be printed and ordered to lie on the table, and be made the pending business at the earliest time tomorrow consistent with the unanimous-consent agreement.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? Is the understanding of the Chair correct that the Senator from Vermont wishes to have his amendment reported now and made the pending business?

Mr. PROUTY. At the earliest time tomorrow consistent with the unanimous-consent agreement.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Then, is the Senator asking that it be received?

Mr. PROUTY. It would be the pending business.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair then believes his understanding is correct.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, as I understand, no amendment is pending.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. No.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I suggest, then, that the amendment of the Senator from Vermont be stated. There will be no yea-and-nay vote on it tonight.

Mr. PROUTY. I thought it had been stated.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The Chief Clerk proceeded to read the amendment.

Mr. PROUTY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the amendment not be read at this time but that it be printed at this point in the RECORD.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

CAPABILITY THE ISSUE IN THE CAMPAIGN

Mr. HART. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed at this point in the RECORD an article entitled "Capability the Issue—Not Race or Creed," which is very brief, and yet, I think, most moving, and which was published in the Detroit Times of Sunday, August 14, 1960. The article was written by a distinguished Episcopal churchman of Michigan, Bishop Richard Emrich. His article gives us the answer to all who whisper. It answers eloquently a problem existent not alone in 1960, but in all society, every year.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

CAPABILITY THE ISSUE—NOT RACE OR CREED

(By Bishop Emrich)

With the concurrence of the chairmen of the two major political parties, Governor Williams has reactivated the Michigan Fair Election Practices Commission, for the purpose of guarding against the intrusion of racial or religious bigotry and unethical campaign practices into the Michigan political scene.

The membership of this commission is: Rabbi Morris Adler, Detroit; Nelson Brown, Mason; Monsignor Bukowski, Grand Rapids; Lester Dodd, Detroit; the Reverend Henry Kuiper, Grand Rapids; the Reverend Dr. Merrill Lenox, Detroit; Dr. Irwin Lubbers, Holland; Edward Turner, Detroit; Dr. Alexander Ruthven, Dexter; Stanley Winkelman, Detroit; and Mrs. Joseph Wolas, Detroit. I am chairman, and Walker Klein of Detroit the able secretary.

As chairman let me make a few comments, and ask the cooperation of the readers.

We live in a pluralistic society, composed of people belonging to many different religious, national, and racial backgrounds. Since America is a melting pot, we have developed for the sake of our unity the virtue of tolerance.

Through our neighbors we have come to recognize that every group has made its fine contribution to American life; and when we are brave enough to be honest and humble, we have learned to admit that many members of other groups are better people than many in our own.

It is simple truth to say that every group has that of which it is proud, and that of which it is ashamed.

Our virtue of tolerance does not mean we are indifferent to truth (God forbid); it means that we respect our neighbor as God has made him, recognize his excellence, and insist that everyone be fair to him.

Unfortunately, however, we know that there have been, and always will be, bigoted people in our society. And, human nature being what it is, there will be some in every group.

Our aim, therefore, should be to keep our own group tolerant, to be fair to our neighbor, and in our society as a whole to keep the unfair person from being respectable.

A good rule is this: judge other groups by their best, never by their worst.

That, after all, is the way each of us wants his own group to be judged. And let our sense of fair play be so strong that our society as a whole will turn on the unfair person, and his methods will militate against him.

Perhaps, since we are a sporting people, we can take an illustration from the Olympic games.

There will be Protestants, Roman Catholics, Jews, Negroes, etc., each playing his part in what we hope will be a great team.

The primary question is whether a man can run, pole vault, or swim, and not his religious or racial background. We would consider a man not only unfair, but balmy, if he insisted that an Irish Roman Catholic run the sprints or a California Protestant throw the discus.

So in politics, the only question worthy of debate is who is the best, wisest, most able, most mature, and most experienced leader for America or our community in this troubled age.

It is wrong to vote for or against a man because of his race or religion.

Nor with a reverse twist, would we put a Moslem in the sprints simply because he was such and we wanted to be tolerant. He should be on the team, no matter who he is, only if he is the best sprinter.

Some countries have laws which are bigoted, cause resentment, and weaken the country. They are not free.

But America's boast can be that we have learned to be tolerant and are still learning.

Let us ask in politics only this question: Is he a good man, a free man, an able man? Will he uphold the Constitution and guide and unite this people?

Beware of anonymous literature.

Remember that someone is afraid or ashamed to put his name to it.

Beware the half-truth, remembering that, like half a brick, it can be thrown farther than the whole truth.

Lift your eyes from your own group and see a Nation that reaches from Maine to Hawaii, and from Florida to Alaska; and vow to do nothing or say nothing that will divide this Nation, or hurt by unfairness any group within it.

Pray for our unity and the best leadership.

Be fair, and love the truth.

Be responsible, and work for your convictions.

FAIR LABOR STANDARDS AMENDMENTS OF 1960

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 3758) to amend the Fair Labor Standards Act of 1938, as amended, to provide coverage of employees of large enterprises engaged in retail trade or service and of other employers engaged in activities affecting commerce, to increase the minimum wage under the act to $1.25 an hour, and for other purposes.

Mr. MONRONEY. Mr. President, I send to the desk an amendment to the Fair Labor Standards Act, as amended, and ask to have the amendment printed at this point in the RECORD and lie on the desk. Let me state that I wish to speak on the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be received and printed, and will lie on the table.

The amendment submitted by Mr. MONRONEY, on behalf of himself, Mr. GORE, Mr. KERR, and Mr. CHURCH, is as follows:

On page 4, line 7, after the figure "(1)" strike the words "any such enterprise which has one or more retail or service establishments" and insert the words "any such enterprise which operates retail or service establishments in two or more States"

Mr. MONRONEY. Mr. President, let me say that this amendment would limit the coverage of retail and service enterprises to those operating establishments in two or more States and grossing $1 million or more. The amendment therefore retains the historic concept of interstate commerce, covers chains operating in two or more States, but exempts locally owned and locally managed enterprises that do business only in a single State. It makes no other change in the committee bill.

The amendment does not affect specific exemptions contained in the committee bill or specific inclusions of new employees other than those engaged in retail and service enterprises operating in one State.

It does not affect the $1.25 per hour provisions of the act, and will provide a total new coverage, according to the Department of Labor, of 3.8 million employees.

BLUNDERING AND ERRATIC HANDLING BY THE ADMINISTRATION OF THE U–2 INCIDENT

Mr. MONRONEY. Mr. President, the most amazing aspect of the presidential campaign to date has been the brazen and transparent attempt of Republican orators, and particularly the Republican press, to divert the attention of the American people from the blundering and erratic handling by this administration of the U–2 incident which preceded the collapse of the summit conference in May. The sorry story of conflicting denials and admissions culminating in suspension of the U–2 flights is now too familiar to require recital again. Rather than attempt the futile job of defending the Republican administration's handling of this affair, Republican partisans have hit upon the device of misquoting and distorting Senator KENNEDY's comment on the incident, in an effort to obscure the real issues which it involved.

I know of no more succinct statement on this Republican tactic than an editorial which appeared in the New York Post on Thursday, August 4, 1960.

Mr. President, I was going to ask unanimous consent to have the editorial printed in the RECORD. But, Mr. President, in line with my own rule to have anything of a political nature stated or read on the floor of the Senate, rather than printed in the RECORD without reading, I shall now read the editorial. As I have said, it was printed in the New York Post of August 4, 1960; and it reads as follows:

WHO APOLOGIZES TO WHOM?

The question of whether Senator KENNEDY ever proposed that President Eisenhower should "apologize" to Premier Khrushchev for the ill-fated U–2 adventure now threatens to reduce our national political debate to the kindergarten level.

All verbal tricks aside, it seems clear that KENNEDY did say that Mr. Eisenhower would have been better advised, having been forced to confess the deed, to express regret in some form for a flagrant incursion into Soviet territory, and thereby deprive Mr. K. of a neat excuse for torpedoing the summit conference.

This was an eminently sound position. It is one which requires no apology from KENNEDY. Indeed, the recurrent effort of the Republican press to make him the villain of the U–2 affair represents a new peak (or gutter) in desperate partisan journalism.

The bland blunders which marked the administration's handling of this episode are so vast that every self-respecting Republican orator ought to be trying to banish all memory of the story. We may never know the full price of the clumsy deviousness. Had a Democratic President floundered so foolishly in a critical moment he would have been crucified. In confronting this issue Mr. KENNEDY has from the beginning displayed poise, restraint and intelligence; his critics have not distinguished themselves.

Mr. President, I yield the floor.

CORRECTION OF STATEMENT ON POSTMASTER NOMINATIONS IN OHIO

Mr. YOUNG of Ohio. Mr. President, we are not always blessed with the opportunity to correct our past errors. Therefore, it gives me great pleasure to be able to do so today, small though the error may be.

In my remarks of last Monday concerning nomination and confirmation—or lack of confirmation—of postmasters, I inadvertently referred to the wrong years in discussing certain Ohio postmastership nominations made by President Harry S. Truman which failed to receive confirmation by the Senate.

It appears, Mr. President, that I was in the right church but the wrong pew.

At that time, Mr. President, I stated that President Harry Truman—during a period of 2 years—1951 and 1952—sent to the Senate nominations for 81 postmasterships in the State of Ohio, all of which were blocked by the late Robert A. Taft, who was then a Senator from Ohio.

In correcting this error, Mr. President, let me say the years I should have referred to were 1947 and 1948. During these 2 years, President Truman sent to the Senate nominations for 82—not 81—postmasterships in the State of Ohio.

Mr. President, I wish to apologize to any Senator whom I may have misled by this inadvertent error.

Throughout 1947 and 1948 Ohio was represented in the U.S. Senate by the late Robert A. Taft, and by Senator John W. Bricker. During these 2 years, the Republican Party had majority control of the Senate and the late Robert A. Taft was one of that party's leading and most respected Senators. In fact, from that time on he was frequently referred to as "Mr. Republican." Senator Bricker was also a distinguished and outstanding member of the Republican Party, having been its vice presidential standard bearer in 1944.

During the 1st session of the 80th Congress, 48 postmastership nominations were made for Ohio. Of that number, 21 failed to receive confirmation, and 7 were withdrawn.

Of even greater interest, Mr. President, is the fact that during the 2d session of the 80th Congress, 62 nominations for postmasterships in Ohio were received by the Senate, one of which was withdrawn. Of the 61 remaining, not one—not a single one—was confirmed by the Senate.

Of course, Mr. President, in recalling these months preceding the 1948 presidential election, there were some misguided or misinformed Americans who felt it was a certainty that Thomas E. Dewey, the Republican candidate, would be elected President. Following his anticipated victory it was taken for granted that the newly elected Republican President, Thomas E. Dewey, would certainly not renominate the postmaster nominees whose names had been sent to the Senate by President Truman.

It is said that the Republican candidate, Thomas Dewey, before September of 1948 had enrolled his children in a private school in Washington, and some high placed individuals who expected Cabinet appointments in the Dewey administration had already leased residential property in Washington.

It was expected, as a matter of course, that one of the first actions of the new President would be to send in nominations for postmasterships of persons who had the endorsement of their Republican organizations, just as postmastership nominations sent to the Senate last year and this year for various Ohio cities have the endorsement of Republican county committees. Naturally, those nominees of President Truman would be in the limbo of the forgotten with the close of the 80th Congress.

The fact is that when Dwight D. Eisenhower was elected President of the United States in 1952, this is what occurred.

Mr. President, perhaps I may have given the late Senator Robert A. Taft more credit than was deservedly his for the reason that his Ohio colleague, the then junior Senator from Ohio, John W. Bricker, might possibly have participated in blocking confirmation of some of these 82 nominations. They were blocked and they stayed blocked.

The facts are that 82 and not 81, as I previously stated, postmastership nominations made by President Truman were blocked by either Senator Taft or Senator Bricker or both. I am willing to accord the credit to both of them. If their action was termed "statesmanlike screening of political appointees" that is agreeable to me.

Also, very frankly, I agree that it was the high duty and responsibility of the late Senator Robert A. Taft and also of my predecessor, Senator Bricker, as it is now mine, to advise and consent to Presidential nominations of this character. I have no doubt they performed their constitutional duty in accord with their consciences and best judgment, just as I am doing, and have been doing, since becoming U.S. Senator from Ohio.

U.S. FUNDS FOR CONGO QUESTIONED

Mr. JOHNSTON of South Carolina. Mr. President, yesterday the distinguished junior Senator from Georgia [Mr. TALMADGE] inserted in the RECORD, along with his appropriate remarks, the editorial of Mr. David Lawrence appearing in yesterday's edition of the Washington Evening Star. I not only concur in the remarks of my friend from Georgia, I also applaud the author of the article for his candor and forthrightness in bringing to our attention and the country's attention the vast assortment of atrocities committed by the half civilized rulers in the Congo.

We will be asked to enrich the coffers of these culprits in the Congo by an appropriation of $100 million if the recommendation of the State Department and our Foreign Relations Committee is approved by the Senate. I wonder how long we are going to tax our people to support and maintain a set of rulers who are killing our people, destroying our investments, and disturbing the peace of the world? I, for one, will not vote 1 cent to help them.

There appears in the advance sheets of the National Review a further elaboration of the debauchery of these jungle primitives. Let the article, the contents of which I endorse, speak for itself. I ask that it be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From National Review, Aug. 20, 1960]

They say it is a fresh wind that is blowing in Africa. We say it is fetid—that it has moved, moreover, on fetid air, and the result is a turbulent front stretching right across the world. We need fresh winds, all right, and if they are to clean out the chancelleries of the world, they will have to blow, and blow, and blow. The diplomatic hypocrisy and cant of recent weeks is almost overpowering. We are rushing about, treating Lumumba as though he were the venerable head of a normal political community, when he is in fact a cheap embezzler, a schizoid agitator (half witch doctor, half Marxist), an opportunist ready to sell out to the highest bidder, ex officio big chief No. 1 of a gang of jungle primitives strutting about in the masks of cabinet ministers.

Bear in mind that 4 weeks have gone by and not one chief of state has publicly deplored the grisly debauch by the Congo's finest of hundreds of innocent white women—missionaries, nuns, teachers, doctors, and 9-year-old children among them. Our statesmen are all too busy—flying Lumumba and his concubine about in flashy airplanes, listening solemnly to him at the United Nations as he beats his tom-tom; putting him up at Blair House, giving him medals in Tunisia, sitting him down to lecture Mohammed V on the wisdom of the jungle.

A recent analog is the submissive silence that greeted the bloody assassination by Colonel Kassem and his fellow mutineers of the entire family of Iraq's King Faisal. (The Queen of England was indisposed with laryngitis when it happened, but she broke silence a few days later, not to mourn a regicide, but to cheer on her horse from the royal enclosure at Ascot.)

It is hard, in the age of ideology, to hang onto one's capacity for shock. But if the Congolese experience is not shocking, what is? Until June 30 the Congo, under Belgian rule, didn't have much liberty (though little gross oppression, either), but was orderly, solvent, well administered, advancing economically, and making a significant contribution to the world economy. Six weeks later the artificially aborted Congo Republic is in chaos, has caused turmoil in all the world, has already cost other nations some $250 million, has turned to mass internecine murder after ravaging and looting the persons and holdings of those who set it free. All this we countenance in the name of an abstraction about self-rule in blind loyalty to which we seem prepared to do anything—go to war, go broke, call Patrice Lumumba "Sir."

Will some politician, somewhere, please open the window?

FEDERAL CIVIL SERVICE EMPLOYEES

Mr. JOHNSTON of South Carolina. Mr. President, I believe Federal civil service employees should know of the fine representation they have received at this session of Congress through the American Federation of Government Employees and the other member organizations of the AFL–CIO Government Employees Council.

The recently enacted salary increase for classified and postal employees provided further evidence of the effectiveness of the American Federation of Government Employees and other organizations comprising the Government Employees Council, in representing their members.

At every hearing held by the Senate Post Office and Civil Service Committee, representatives of the AFGE were on hand to express opinions, suggestions for improvement, and facts regarding proposed legislation.

Their testimony has been most valuable to the Committee on Post Office and Civil Service in its deliberations on bills affecting the personnel policies governing Federal employment.

I think employees should know that the path to improvement of their wages and working conditions would have been many times more difficult had it not been for the intelligent and effective activity of the AFGE and its officers and representatives.

It has been a pleasure to have had the cooperation of this patriotic and public-spirited organization of Government employees.

FAIR LABOR STANDARDS AMENDMENTS OF 1960

Mr. McNAMARA. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD a statement, prepared by me, relating to the consideration of the bill (S. 3758) to amend the Fair Labor Standards Act of 1938, as amended, to provide coverage for employees of large enterprises engaged in retail trade or service and of other employers engaged in activities affecting commerce, to increase the minimum wage under the act to $1.25 an hour, and for other purposes.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

STATEMENT BY SENATOR MCNAMARA

During this debate, there have been entirely too many statements about the generosity of the Labor and Public Welfare Committee.

We have been told that we are seeking to cover practically everybody—whether they need coverage or not.

I would just like to point out that many groups—who should be covered—are not.

One group which deserves coverage—but which is not included in the bill before us—is the personnel of the Nation's hospitals.

According to the American Hospital Association's 1958 Hospital Guide, the total personnel employed in 6,330 hospitals was 1,355,549, of which 263,095 are registered professional nurses, 416,662 are practical nurses and nurses' aids, 103,722 are related technical personnel, and 599,070 are nonprofessional personnel. Salaries differ substantially among areas. According to the BLS survey of hospital employment conditions conducted in 1956 and early 1957, the salaries of general duty nurses in private hospitals varied from $56.50 a week in Philadelphia to $72 in Chicago and San Francisco; practical nurses in non-Government hospitals earned from $35.50 to $57 weekly; and nurses' aids earned from $27.50 to $57 weekly.

The salary range for nonprofessional personnel goes on down the scale with the highest paid being technical stenographers and switchboard operators ($51 to $72.50 a week); and the lowest being kitchen helpers (45 cents to $1.31 an hour); laundry workers (48 cents to $1.40 an hour); and maids (40 cents to $1.34 an hour).

In most of the hospitals studied in 16 metropolitan areas, overtime was reimbursed by either straight-time pay or equal time off, relatively few provided meals or rooms in addition to cash salaries, and less than one-third provided uniforms or laundry services.

Since hospitals only voluntarily come under social security, and since they are also exempt from the Taft-Hartley Act and thus not required to bargain with employees, recent surveys show that 40 percent of non-Government hospital employees are not covered by social security, and 50 percent of State and local public agencies do not provide social security benefits for employees.

TRANSACTION OF ADDITIONAL ROUTINE BUSINESS

By unanimous consent, the following additional routine business was transacted:

FAIR LABOR STANDARDS AMENDMENTS OF 1960—AMENDMENTS

Mr. PROUTY proposed an amendment to the bill (S. 3758) to provide coverage for employees of large enterprises engaged in retail trade or service and of other employers engaged in activities affecting commerce, to increase the minimum wage under the act to $1.25 an hour, and for other purposes, which was ordered to be printed.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

WEDNESDAY, AUGUST 17, 1960

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

Rabbi Jacob S. Green, Ohr Knesseth Israel-Anshe Sphard Congregation, Baltimore, Md., offered the following prayer:

We thank Thee for the dignity and majesty of man, for the spirit of wisdom with which Thou didst endow him, for the vision with which he is possessed, for the sensitivity of his heart and the profoundness of his soul. We thank Thee for the dominion that is his overall creation, for his capacity to live with all his kind and for the urge that stimulates him to search, to seek, and ultimately to approach even Thee. For all these blessings we thank Thee.

Almighty God, we pray that we may remain true to the destiny for which we were created. We pray that the dignity of human personality may be preserved and the reverence of man for man may continue. We pray that the beautiful heavens that Thou didst spread over our heads may not be darkened by the clouds of hate and that the magic carpet which is earth may not be disturbed by the tramp of hostile feet. We pray that man's inhumanity to man may forever end and that human genius may continue to strive for greater perfection and for nobler fulfillment. Let man come to understand that he is closest to God when he is nearer to man, that he worships at Thy holy throne when he serves Thy creatures and that he is within Thy holy shrine when he is at one with his fellow beings. Amen.

EXTENSIONS OF REMARKS

Address of Representative Robert W. Hemphill, Rock Hill, S.C.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. OLIN D. JOHNSTON

OF SOUTH CAROLINA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Wednesday, August 17, 1960

Mr. JOHNSTON of South Carolina. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD the remarks of the Honorable ROBERT W. HEMPHILL, Member of the House of Representatives from the Fifth District of South Carolina, delivered on July 25 at Rock Hill, S.C.

Representative HEMPHILL paid tribute to the late C. Harris Williams of Rock Hill, S.C. Mr. Williams was one of the great humanitarians of our day and it was through his kindness of heart and sincere personality that made all the people of South Carolina have so much love and respect for him.

The people of South Carolina feel it appropriate to erect a memorial to Mr. Williams at McDow Park, which is in the city of Rock Hill. I feel it very fitting that Representative HEMPHILL's address to those gathered at this event be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

HOW GLORIOUS IT IS TO LIVE

(Address by Representative ROBERT W. HEMPHILL on the occasion of the dinner of the C. Harris Williams Memorial Fund at Joslin Park, Rock Hill, S.C., July 25, 1960)

Mr. Chairman, my good friend Billy Hayes, honored members of the C. Harris Williams Memorial Fund Steering Committee, honored senator and members of the York County legislative delegation, distinguished guests of near and far, and fellow friends of the late and beloved we gather to honor this evening.

I have been honored many times by invitations to speak to groups or assemblies, each time in humble reflection of my inadequacies, gratitude at the opportunity of discussion and fellowship, but no occasion has aroused by reflection on good deeds, or good works, as this occasion. Each of us, I am sure, has rejoiced in many friendships, experienced the warmth of treasured companionship, leaned on the sympathy of great understanding, and eagerly sought the compassion and understanding of a fellow traveler on the high road of today's civilization—and all of us have had the good fortune of knowing and loving as a good friend, our late and great friend, Harris Williams. Tonight and always we delight to do honor to his memory and perpetuate his good deeds.

When we think of the way of life he expressed, we are reminded of the poem:

"We live in deeds, not years; in thoughts, not breaths; in feelings, not in figures on a dial.
We should count time by heart throbs. He most lives
Who thinks most, feels the noblest, acts the best"—Bailey.

To all of us who love nature there are days so glorious and exhilarating that life is a certain conquest, nights so filled with radiance that we are sure of our destiny, resolved to our duty of usefulness. Such was every day and night to Harris. His life was a mission—of joy, of help, of happiness, of fun, of faith, of usefulness. Never seeking the acclaim of high office, too big to be charmed by the little pleasures of personal acclaim, he went his way doing good, spreading sunshine, showing by example how glorious it was and is to live, to inspire, to help a fellow man.

His loyalty was legion. His loved ones, his home, his church, his country, his community, his business, his friends, all enjoyed the fierce loyalty of his devotion. One could but mention his family, and his face would glow with pride and love. No friend ever dropped in but "Won't you drop by the house?" automatically signaled his love and family pride.

He became a legend long before his time. One of the stories about him tells of his instrumentality in getting robes for his church. They teased him about a request that "C. Harris Williams Gulf Service" be lettered on the back. His spontaneous grin at the joke was quickly followed by his invitation to "come down to Neely's Creek next Sunday and join us." He loved his church and he served its purposes—how many were his charities will never be known—the good he did was exemplary of a Christian life.

He served his country in time of war and in time of peace.

"The man who loves his home best,
And loves it most unselfishly, Loves his country best."

—Holland.

Such was only part of his service. I personally remember his unstinting service as a member of the York County grand jury, unstinting, unselfish, interested, untiring. He never shirked a duty, gloried in every task for public good. He accepted every appointment to commissioner and to boards carrying duty without remuneration, work with little chance of appreciation or praise. In his home county are statues or progress bearing the indelible imprint of his character and devotion.

He loved politics. He knew the increasing role of politics in the life of the Nation. He could have run for any office with assurance of voluminous support, confident of election. His ability was well known, his concern for his fellow man an every day effort, and his love for people was salutary. Instead, he participated with tremendous vigor, finest sportsmanship, and greatest loyalty. Happy and fortunate was the candidate who had his friendship. To him politics was fun, though a necessity. He believed in—

"The freeman casting, with unpurchased hand,
The vote that shakes the turrets of the land."

—Holmes.

Yes; he bet on politics. If he won, he never chided the loser; but if he lost, his was the loudest, the best sportsmanship, publicly acclaiming his mistake, laughing his way into the hearts of his opposition. He was known, loved, respected—never hated. Judge and juryman, legislator, senator, sheriff, clerk, and constable all sought his advice, basked in the sunshine of his friendship. Would that more men took such interest in politics—every election would present a challenge, every political aspirant a seeker of high purpose as a requisite of high office.

As we move from horizon to horizon in the life of this good man we reflect on a few of the intimate personal expressions of his belief:

A community that could always count on Harris to be in the forefront.

Almost every parade in a nearby town knew "Mister Rock Hill" was there.

No Federal court ever met in Rock Hill but the admiration of court officials brought this smiling citizen to the courtroom.

No visiting judge ever had a complete term in York unless he met Harris.

No horse show could hope for success without him.

He never asked for himself—always for others.

I know of many men who received the mercy of the court because of his insistence.

I know of men inspired of great service in public office because of his sustaining friendship.

I know of young men now training in the military academies because he sponsored them.

Like others, I cannot know the full measure of his charity; he used his talents to bless his fellow men; but I hope to echo here the silent praise of people everywhere, people who have been helped or guided, a chorus of gratitude for good works.

And so in fitting tribute we gather here tonight determined to perpetuate his memory in the lives of young people tomorrow and in the future.

And as the young of succeeding generations find happiness and seek guidance for usefulness under optimist guidance, I hope the story of Harris Williams will be told and retold. And those who knew and loved him as a friend will remember:

A friend, in work, in play, in sorrow;
The same yesterday, today, and tomorrow.

And others, blessed by his charity, heartened by his smile, made happy by his association, or just a silent admirer, will recall his way of living a glorious life.

If you can give the unforgiving minute
Sixty seconds' worth of distant run,
Yours is the world and all that's in it,
And, what's more, you'll be a man, my son.
Thank you.

SENATE

THURSDAY, AUGUST 18, 1960

(Legislative day of Thursday, August 11, 1960)

The Senate met at 10 o'clock a.m., on the expiration of the recess, and was called to order by the Vice President.

The Chaplain, Rev. Frederick Brown Harris, D.D., offered the following prayer:

Almighty God, who settest the solitary in families, and families in nations, and nations in the common bond of humanity, beyond and above all the frontiers which we mark and guard may we be caught up into Thy great purposes, finding in Thee the goal of all our striving and the end of all desire.

Deliver us from thoughtless content with ourselves and from narrow contempt for others. Give us to see on this shrinking globe that all are bound up in the same bundle of life together.

If the soiled fingers of the world have tarnished our integrity, burnish us once again in Thy presence, that whatsoever is excellent, beautiful, and of a good report may shine in our eyes and become again the object of our care, our faith, and our devotion.

In the dear Redeemer's name. Amen.

PROPOSED AMENDMENT TO CONSTITUTION, RELATING TO ELECTION OF PRESIDENT AND VICE PRESIDENT

Mr. JOHNSTON of South Carolina. Mr. President, I introduce, for appropriate reference, a joint resolution proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States providing for the election of President and Vice President.

This joint resolution is similar to Senate Joint Resolution 200 of the 80th Congress, which was reintroduced during the 81st Congress and subsequently favorably acted upon by the Senate. A volume of hearings has been held on this subject, and similar proposals have been introduced in the Congress since as early as 1797, when Representative William L. Smith of South Carolina offered to the Congress the first constitutional amendment proposing reform of our procedure for electing the President.

My personal opinion is that our present system of electing President and Vice President is antiquated and in great need of overhauling by means of a constitutional amendment similar to that which I am proposing. Despite the mass of hearings that have been held in the past on this subject, I feel it is necessary that the two houses of Congress again hold hearings on the matter. Times have changed, and conditions may have changed which would result in the bringing out of new facts at such hearings.

I fully realize that no action on this proposal will be forthcoming during this hectic session of Congress. However, I feel that by offering this resolution with the accompanying statement, some Members of the Senate will have an opportunity to give this proposed legislation consideration before next year. I shall reintroduce this resolution in January and invite cosponsors at that time.

Briefly, the reforms which this proposed constitutional amendment seeks to effect are threefold in nature:

First. It abolishes entirely the office of presidential elector. The electoral vote per State—equal to the total number of Representatives and Senators, as under the existing system—is retained, but purely as an automatic counting device.

Second. It eliminates any possibility of an election being thrown into the House of Representatives.

Third. It does away with the so-called unit-rule system of counting electoral votes. Under the existing system, the candidate receiving a plurality of the popular vote in any given State is credited with all the electoral votes of that State, regardless of how infinitesimal the plurality. Under the proposed system, the electoral votes in each State are automatically divided among the candidates in direct proportion to the popular vote.

For example, a State has 12 electoral votes. Of the 2,400,000 popular votes cast in that State, "R," the Republican, received 1,600,000. "D," the Democrat, received 600,000. "T," the third party candidate, received 200,000. Under the present system, all of the State's 12 electoral votes would go to "R," the Republican. Under the proposed system, the electoral vote would be divided in proportion to the popular vote as follows: Eight electoral votes for "R"; three electoral votes for "D"; and one electoral vote for "T."

The electoral votes are computed to three decimal places. In the very remote, but mathematically possible, event of a tie, it is provided that the candidate receiving the greatest number of popular votes wins the election.

The electoral votes which each candidate receives, therefore, represent his proportional strength in the State. These votes are then taken and added to the electoral votes received in all the other States. The candidate having the greatest number of electoral votes wins the Presidency. Votes for Vice President are counted in precisely the same manner.

Since 1797, when the first constitutional amendment proposing reform of our procedure for electing the President was offered, hardly a session of Congress has passed without the introduction of one or more resolutions of this character. All these proposals recognized, as does the reform embodied in this Senate joint resolution which I offer, that the so-called electoral college system has never functioned as contemplated by the framers of the Constitution.

The delegates to the Constitutional Convention were, for the most part, definitely opposed to electing the President by direct popular vote, agreeing with George Mason of Virginia that "it were as unnatural to refer the choice of a proper character for Chief Magistrate to the people, as it would be to refer a trial of colors to a blind man." The delegates distrusted the ability of the average citizen of that day to decide questions of such great gravity. Moreover, the discussions of the Convention reveal that the delegates did not believe that it was possible for a voter in one State to know anything about the ability or character of public men in the other States scattered along our 1,500-mile shore line. In addition, those representing the smaller States believed that popular election would somehow increase the power and prestige of the more heavily populated States.

These considerations, after probably the most prolonged debate of the convention, led to adoption of the indirect method of electing the President. Under this plan, the States were to select well-informed public men who were to look the field over and elect a President and Vice President. In selecting these electors, each State was left free to use any procedure it might see fit to adopt—direct popular election of the electors on a general, blanket ticket—the procedure used in all States today—or by single Member districts; or by the vote of the legislature itself—a procedure which all the States had abandoned by 1860.

The electors so selected by each State should meet, it was decided, on a given date at a designated place within the State and vote by ballot for two persons. They were required to send a list of all persons voted for and the number of votes for each, to the President of the Senate, where, on a date fixed by law, they were to be opened in the presence of the two Houses, and the vote counted. The person having the largest number of votes was to be declared President if such number were a majority of all the votes cast. The runner-up should be declared Vice President whether he had a majority or not—later modified by the 12th amendment.

This is the system which, modified by the 12th amendment, has continued in effect up to the present time. It has retained the original form even though all reason for this form has long since disappeared. The historian, Arthur M. Schlesinger, recently wrote in his book, "Paths to the Present":

> What demoted the electoral college from a deliberative body to a puppet show was the rise of political parties. As people began taking sides on public questions, they were unwilling to leave the crucial choice of the Chief Executive to a sort of lottery. Instead, each party publicly announced its slate of electors and the candidate they would support. This usurpation of the electors' functions, though peaceably achieved, amounted to a coup d'etat. It was an amendment of the written Constitution by the unwritten constitution. The electors, while retaining the legal status of independence, became henceforth hardly more than men in livery taking orders from their parties.

Individual Members of Congress, of course, have always been mindful of the fact that this indirect method of electing the President stood in need of modernization. As stated before, the first legislative proposal for reform came in 1767, only 10 years after the Constitutional Convention itself. In the 70-year period between 1889 and 1960, more than 125 amendment proposals relating to the election of the President have been introduced in Congress. Prior to that time, proponents of the 12th amendment were successful in their efforts to correct the situation created by the Jefferson-Burr electoral-vote tie in 1800. Senator Thomas Hart Benton, of Missouri, with the strong support of President Andrew Jackson, made this a prime object of his concern over a period of 20 years in the 1820's and 1830's. Senator Oliver H. P. Morton, of Indiana, led the fight in the 1880's. The late Senator George W. Norris was the principal proponent of reform in more recent times; his proposal for direct popular election of the President failed to command the necessary two-thirds of the Senate in 1934. In both the 72d and 73d Congresses, House committees unanimously reported resolutions calling for abolition of the electoral college. In the 80th Congress another unanimous House Judiciary Committee report was submitted.

A side effect or advantage of this type of election reformation would be to reduce the emphasis now placed by candidates of various parties for public office on the solicitation of minority group votes. Nothing would do more to remove race, creed, and color from our national elections than for this election reformation to be approved.

As it has been pointed out, under the present system, one vote can deliver all the electoral votes of a large State into the hands of one candidate, these in turn being sufficient to swing the election of the whole country. Under the reformation I offer, this misrepresentation of the people's will would be eliminated. The one-vote vantage from a minority group would no longer exist, and the petty politics now played by politicians who prey on differences of men's race and religion would no longer enter the political arena.

I also believe the system outlined in the amendment offered will certainly create for us a more democratic method of electing our President and Vice President, for under this system every man's vote will be counted in the selection of President and Vice President.

I hope every Member of Congress will give this matter serious consideration between now and January, for I certainly believe the day for reformation in this field is long overdue.

I ask unanimous consent that the proposed legislation be printed in the RECORD.

The Senate passed a similar resolution some years ago and sent it to the House, but the House did not act on it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The joint resolution will be received and appropriately referred; and, without objection, the joint resolution will be printed in the RECORD.

The joint resolution (S.J. Res. 219) proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States providing for the election of President and Vice President, introduced by Mr. JOHNSTON of South Carolina, was received, read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That an amendment is hereby proposed to the Constitution of the United States which shall be valid to all intents and purposes as part of the Constitution when ratified by three-fourths of the legislatures of the several States. Said amendment shall be as follows:

"ARTICLE

"SECTION 1. The executive power shall be vested in a President of the United States of America. He shall hold his office during the term of four years, and together with the Vice President, chosen for the same term, be elected as provided in this Constitution.

"The electoral college system of electing the President and Vice President of the United States is hereby abolished. The President and Vice President shall be elected by the people of the several States. The electors in each State shall have the qualifications requisite for electors of the most numerous branch of the State legislature. Congress shall determine the time of such election, which shall be the same throughout the United States. Until otherwise determined by the Congress, such election shall be held on the Tuesday next after the first Monday in November of the year preceding the year in which the regular term of the President is to begin. Each State shall be entitled to a number of electoral votes equal to the whole number of Senators and Representatives to which such State may be entitled in the Congress.

"Within forty-five days after such election, or at such time as the Congress shall direct, the official custodian of the election returns of each State shall make distinct lists of all persons for whom votes were cast for President and the number of votes for each, and the total vote of the electors of the State for all persons for President, which lists he shall sign and certify and transmit sealed to the seat of the Government of the United States, directed to the President of the Senate. The President of the Senate shall in the presence of the Senate and House of Representatives open all certificates and the votes shall then be counted. Each person for whom votes were cast for President in each State shall be credited with such proportion of the electoral votes thereof as he received of the total vote of the electors therein for President. In making the computations, fractional numbers less than one one-thousandth shall be disregarded unless a more detailed calculation would change the result of the election. The person having the greatest number of electoral votes for President shall be President. If two or more persons shall have an equal and the highest number of such votes, then the one for whom the greatest number of popular votes were cast shall be President.

"The Vice President shall be likewise elected, at the same time and in the same manner and subject to the same provisions, as the President, but no person constitutionally ineligible for the office of President shall be eligible to that of Vice President of the United States.

"SEC. 2. Paragraphs 1, 2, and 3 of section 1, article II, of the Constitution, and the twelfth article of amendment to the Constitution, are hereby repealed.

"SEC. 3. This article shall take effect on the tenth day of February following its ratification.

"SEC. 4. This article shall be inoperative unless it shall have been ratified as an amendment to the Constitution by the legislatures of three-fourths of the States within seven years from the date of its submission to the States by the Congress."

A RULE OF GERMANENESS IN THE SENATE

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, on Tuesday, August 16, I addressed the Senate briefly on the subject of nongermane debate and the desirability of amending the Senate rules.

I should like to turn to that subject now in order to complete my comments on the analysis of Senate sessions to date, which in my judgment call for an amendment of the rules next January.

On Monday, August 15, the Senate convened at 12 o'clock noon, and recessed at 8:59 p.m. During that period, under the procedures which I outlined in my earlier remarks, the pending business, the fair labor standards bill, was discussed for a little more than an hour, out of a total session of 9 hours. There was no morning hour, because the Senate had recessed from the previous day. Thus, only 15.4 percent of the total spoken time was devoted to the fair labor standards bill, the pending business.

On the following day, Tuesday, August 16, the Senate convened at 10 a.m., and recessed at 5:38 p.m. Out of a total session of 7 hours and 38 minutes, 3 hours and 3 minutes were devoted to germane debate on the pending business.

In other words, 40 percent of the total spoken time was germane to the pending business.

I suggest that the analysis of these 2 days makes it clear that a rule of germaneness would be most desirable when we come back next January.

Turning to another subject, which is the amendment of the rules of the Senate, I send to the desk for appropriate referral a resolution amending rule XIX of the Standing Rules of the Senate, relating to debate, and I ask that the resolution may lie on the table until Monday of next week in order that other Senators who desire to cosponsor it may have an opportunity to do so.

The resolution would establish a rule of germaneness, which I believe to be most desirable. At a later time I shall have a full statement in support of the rule, and hope to get recognition in order to present it, and will at the same time have a press release, which will discuss at greater length my reasons for supporting the rule.

I yield the floor.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The resolution will be read.

The legislative clerk read the resolution, as follows:

Resolved, That rule XIX of the Standing Rules of the Senate (relating to debate) is amended by adding the following new paragraph numbered 7:

"A question of germaneness may be raised by any Senator at any time during the consideration of a measure, motion, or other matter, and thereafter all further debate under the order for pending business shall be germane to the subject matter before the Senate. All questions of germaneness of debate under this rule, when raised, including appeals, shall be submitted to the Senate and be decided without debate."

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, is there a unanimous-consent request pending? If so, reserving the right to object, I should like to propound a parliamentary inquiry to the Chair. It will not affect the Senator, but I would like to find out something.

Mr. CLARK. I made no unanimous-consent request. I asked that the resolution lie on the table.

Mr. JAVITS. May I be recognized for an instant, to make a parliamentary inquiry?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator is recognized for an instant.

Mr. JAVITS. My parliamentary inquiry is this: Under what procedure are we now referring bills or resolutions to committee, or having them lie upon the desk or taking any other action, in view of the fact that we have no morning hour?

The VICE PRESIDENT. By unanimous-consent agreement.

Mr. JAVITS. I thank the Chair.

Mr. JOHNSTON of South Carolina. With respect to the resolution that was sent to the desk, no immediate consideration of it is asked, is there?

The VICE PRESIDENT. No request was made for immediate consideration.

Mr. JOHNSTON of South Carolina. If there were, I would want to be heard, because I would object to the consideration of it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The resolution will be received and appropriately referred; and, without objection, the resolution will lie on the desk, as requested by the Senator from Pennsylvania.

The resolution (S. Res. 361) providing for germaneness of debate, submitted by Mr. CLARK, was referred to the Committee on Rules and Administration.

FAIR LABOR STANDARDS AMENDMENTS OF 1960—AMENDMENTS

Mr. LAUSCHE submitted amendments, intended to be proposed by him, to the bill (S. 3758) to amend the Fair Labor Standards Act of 1938, as amended, to provide coverage for employees of large enterprises engaged in retail trade or service and of other employers engaged in activities affecting commerce, to increase the minimum wage under the act to $1.25 an hour, and for other purposes, which were ordered to lie on the table and to be printed.

ADDRESSES, EDITORIALS, ARTICLES, ETC., PRINTED IN THE RECORD

On request, and by unanimous consent, addresses, editorials, articles, etc., were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

By Mr. HUMPHREY:

Article entitled "We Must Climb to the Hill Top," written by Senator KENNEDY and published in the August 22, 1960, edition of Life magazine.

THE RIGHT TO WORK

Mr. BYRD of Virginia. Mr. President, the 1960 Democratic platform adopted in Los Angeles makes the direct and unequivocal statement:

We will repeal the authorization for right-to-work laws.

This is a platform promise that labor leaders will allow no one to forget. It follows their demands before the platform committee, and they will demand fulfillment of the promise.

Repeal of the authorization would deny the right of States to enact laws protecting workers from forced membership in unions as a condition for employment.

It would result in wholesale nullification of right-to-work laws enacted to date in 20 States, including constitutional provisions adopted by referenda in 8 States.

Labor leaders have organized their unions for political pressure. Success in their demand for Federal nullification of all State right-to-work laws would be an exhibition of tremendous power.

Fulfillment of this pledge would be a massive victory for such labor leaders as Reuther, Meany, Hoffa, and McDonald; and they would capitalize on it.

Power breeds power, and labor leaders are insatiable in their demands for special privilege and special legislation for immunity.

Repeal of the authorization for right-to-work laws would be followed by a drive to repeal all protective provisions in the Taft-Hartley Act and other statutes in the whole labor field.

George Meany, president of CIO–AFL, told the 1960 Democratic platform committee:

> Congress should enact new legislation based on the principles of the Wagner Act. This would automatically eliminate the vicious so-called right-to-work laws. The Landrum-Griffin Act is in urgent need of rewriting to eliminate the unwarranted burdens it places on unions.

The Democratic platform says:

> We will repeal the authorization for right-to-work laws, limitations on the right to strike, to picket peacefully and to tell the public the facts of a labor dispute, and other anti-labor features of the Taft-Hartley Act and the 1959 Landrum-Griffin Act.

There is no reason to think labor leaders of the stripe we have today will at any time relax their pressure for the complete fulfillment of these platform pledges.

Federal nullification of the rights of States to protect the freedom of individuals in their efforts to earn a living is high on their list of demands. The platform language is a clear and positive pledge to meet this demand by repealing the authorization for State right-to-work laws.

Unless reversed by the candidates, there can be no doubt that this is a campaign promise to repeal section 14(b) of the Taft-Hartley Act which deliberately has recognized the validity of State right-to-work laws.

Congress, after long and searching debate, deliberately conceded the validity of State law in this field as a means of protecting the freedom to work, with or without membership in a labor union.

This is an appropriate time for me to say I shall oppose with all my strength and ability repeal of authorization for right-to-work laws.

I regard the right to work as I do the right to life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness. It is the right, the responsibility, and the duty of States to protect this fundamental freedom.

The effect of this platform pledge would be national recognition of union membership as a condition for getting and holding a job, and to destroy State laws and constitutional provisions standing in the way.

Existing Federal law already legalizes collective-bargaining contracts making union membership a condition for employment wherever it is not prohibited by State law.

States have enacted laws to provide that the right of individuals to work shall not be denied on account of either membership or nonmembership in labor organizations.

Fulfillment of the Los Angeles pledge would enable the Warren Court to strike down all of these State laws; and if freed of the congressional restriction, I suspect the Warren Court would act promptly.

If labor leaders desire to repeal right-to-work laws in 20 States, 8 with constitutional provisions, they can make their proposals in the States involved.

That would be an orderly and constitutional procedure under our form of government. It would be far more democratic than blitzkrieg nullification by the Federal Government.

Virginia's 13-year-old right-to-work statute would be among those to go as the Warren Court extended its record of States rights destruction.

The Virginia law was enacted on the recommendation of Gov. WILLIAM M. TUCK, one of the finest and most courageous Governors in Virginia's long history. He is now a Member of Congress.

The Tuck law provides that neither union membership nor nonmembership in labor organizations shall be made a condition of employment in collective bargaining contracts.

The Virginia right-to-work law is representative of the tenor of virtually all the State statutes and constitutional amendments on the subject. Under this law, enacted 13 years ago, Virginia has avoided any serious strike during that long period of time.

The eight States which by popular vote have amended their constitutions in such a way as to protect the right to work are: Arizona, which also adopted its statute by referendum; Arkansas; Florida; Kansas; Mississippi; Nebraska; North Dakota; and South Dakota.

Yet it is proposed to invalidate those right-to-work provisions of the constitutions of those States, enacted by the votes of their people.

The 20 right-to-work law States are: Alabama, Arizona, Arkansas, Florida, Georgia, Indiana, Iowa, Kansas, Mississippi, Nebraska, Nevada, North Carolina, North Dakota, South Carolina, South Dakota, Tennessee, Texas, Utah, Virginia, and Louisiana. Louisiana has a law which applies only to agricultural workers.

Nothing in these State laws prohibits or impedes collective bargaining. Nothing in them forbids union affiliation. They protect the privilege of union membership for those who wish to join.

Some working men and women want to join unions; others do not. Nearly two of every three workers in nonagricultural industries in the United States are not union members.

The corollary of the right to join a union is the right not to join. In the vital human endeavor of earning a livelihood, both sides of this right to work must be protected.

The Warren Court's attitude toward States rights and interstate commerce, and the political and economic influence of those who are leading national and international labor unions, are matters of record.

Under the circumstances, it would be foolish to think Federal law legalizing compulsory union membership as a condition for employment would affect only employees of industries engaged in interstate commerce.

Compulsory membership in a labor union as a condition to exercise the right of earning a living in the United States is repugnant to the fundamental freedom for which this Nation stands.

The Democratic platform labor pledge taken in Los Angeles would be destructive of two great principles on which this Nation is founded—individual liberty and States rights.

These are among the safeguards of our freedom against tyrannical central government. To defend this freedom I shall oppose the repeal of the authorization for State right-to-work laws whenever and wherever the effort is made.

At this point I submit the following analysis of the labor platform adopted by the Democratic Party as prepared by my staff:

> Calls present administration anti-labor. Emphasizes Full Employment Act objectives. Pledged $1.25 minimum wage, extension of unemployment compensation coverage, protection of migrant, farm, etc., workers. Would outlaw State right-to-work laws. Pledges repeal of anti-labor and restrictive provisions of Taft-Hartley and 1959 Disclosure Act in re picketing, striking, negotiating, organizing, etc. Would strengthen and modernize Davis-Bacon and Walsh-Healey Acts in re Federal works and contracts. In addition, great emphasis is placed on a pledge for administration with sympathetic understanding.

CHILDREN URGENTLY NEED HEALTH INSURANCE PROGRAM TO SUPPORT ELDERLY FATHER

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, a Wisconsin constituent writes of the immense and endless burden on his children of a beloved but seriously and expensively ill father. The frightful psychological toll of this heavy burden of illness on both father and children is implicit all through the letter.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that this letter be inserted in the RECORD at this point.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD as follows:

> DEAR SENATOR: My father-in-law is now in an old-age home in the State. We had him here for 10 days after he was able to leave the hospital. We were unable to take care of him and were very fortunate to get him in the home. It costs the family $130 a month. The hospital was $424.95 with doctors' bills totaling $260.
> Now the home wants all the children to sign that they will pay all medical aid if he has to go to a hospital again. We are compelled to sign it in order to keep him in the home. This could go on for years, although he will be 88 this month. He does receive $33 social security a month, but it is just a drop in the bucket.
> Please help.

OUTRAGED TAXPAYERS REVOLT AGAINST CIVIL DEFENSE AS NOW CONDUCTED

Mr. YOUNG of Ohio. Mr. President, the present waste of millions of dollars each year for an outmoded civil defense program is nothing more than a futile gesture to fool ourselves and American taxpayers into thinking that something is being done to defend our civilians. To face the issue squarely, we should quit wasting taxpayers' money.

The ills and ailments afflicting the boondoggling civil defense agency are too numerous to mention at this time. I have tried to do so in the past, and shall continue in the future, to expose the inherent waste and inefficiency of this public liability.

First and foremost of these is the fact that the goals of our subaverage civil defense planners are hidden by confusion and ineptness. Americans are bewildered as to what they should do in event of a nuclear attack. They are unsure whether to hide in holes in the ground or in their basements or to run for the hills.

For years civil defense officials have advised evacuation from target areas. Maps with escape routes were distributed by the millions; highway markers were nailed up; evacuation centers were designated—all at public expense. Then, Mr. President, it suddenly dawned on the planners that 15 to 20 minutes' warning would not suffice to get people anywhere. In fact, even an attempt to evacuate any of our major cities on such short notice would probably result in more casualties than the enemy attack would directly inflict.

Of course, Mr. President, both theories are completely unrealistic and absurd. The thermonuclear weapon, with its fantastic power for destruction, and the intercontinental ballistics missile, with its immense speed and accuracy, have now made evacuation not only impractical, but impossible.

Likewise, basement and backyard shelters would be useless in a nuclear war. Instead of saving people, they would probably act as ovens and bake them. Assuming, for the sake of argument, that they would be of some dubious value, a shelter program would cost anywhere from the conservative estimate of a total of $25 billion to a recent authoritative estimate of $50 billion to $100 billion.

Mr. President, is any member of either body of the Congress willing to advocate that we embark upon a program of this magnitude which in itself offers little if any guarantee of survival in a nuclear war?

Money is not the full measure of its absurdity. No price would be too high for real security. It is also a waste of too much national energy and thought on futile irrelevancies. Unfortunately, many of the people with the biggest ideas about shelters have the smallest ideas about seeking permanent peace.

The eager beavers running the civil defense agency are probably the most frustrated bureaucrats on the Federal payroll. What was once merely public apathy and boredom toward their foolish schemes is gradually becoming opposition as it becomes increasingly clear that our civil defense program is a myth; a delusion. Taxpayers are in revolt against the utter waste of their money on civil defense as now conducted.

Unfortunately, it is an expensive delusion in terms of taxpayers' hard-earned money. For fiscal year 1961 the Office of Civil and Defense Mobilization requested an appropriation of $76,350,000. This was $76,350,000 too much.

Fortunately, Congress had the good judgment and common sense to deny at least $16,225,000 of this request. It is interesting to note that $10,800,000 of this amount was previously designated for salaries and expenses of this overstaffed and overpaid agency. Even with this cut, 60 percent of the appropriation is destined for salaries and expenses.

In addition to this savings, Mr. President, we wisely refused to appropriate $3,800,000 requested by the administration for the General Services Administration to construct relocation facilities—in plain words, bomb shelters in public buildings. Of what earthly use are expensively built shelters in Federal buildings, most of which are located in metropolitan areas where shelters will be of no protection? At a time when the Nation faces serious housing problems, which administration officials refuse to deal with adequately, it would have been foolish and fruitless for us to authorize millions of dollars for useless shelters in public buildings.

Mr. President, unbelievable as it may seem, the 1961 fiscal year request of this boondoggling agency is based on a staff of personnel of which over 40 percent will each receive more than $10,000 a year and render no useful public service for those salaries. This percentage is substantially the same as that in past years. If there was ever a place in the Federal bureaucracy to wield the meat ax, this is it.

It is incredible that hard-earned dollars of American taxpayers should be used to pay high salaries to subaverage planners feeding at the public trough. It is an inexcusable waste of public funds.

Mr. President, the defense of our civilian population is part of the total defense of our country. As such, it should be under the direction of those who know most about defense—the leaders of our armed services.

In fact, the defense of civilians in Hawaii, the State in which the distinguished Senator now presiding over the Chamber [Mr. FONG] lives, and the defense of civilians in the 49 other States of these United States is a major factor in the defense of our country. It must be placed in the hands of and be the responsibility of the Armed Forces of our country, rather than be left in the hands of "lameduck" politicians of both political parties, in the hands of vivilians with armbands.

The distinguished Senator now presiding knows from observations in Hawaii and elsewhere with what contempt and disdain a hardboiled American Army sergeant would treat a civilian with an armband if he tried to impede the movement of our Armed Forces at a time of great emergency and calamity, when we were subject to an attack by enemy forces.

Why, then, continue with a separate agency, politically inspired and politically staffed, to handle the vital problem of the defense of our people in wartime? The Nation cannot afford to separate the defense of its most valuable resource—our people—from the defense of the Nation as a whole.

There will be a new President, I am glad to say, next January 20. He will be Commander in Chief of our Armed Forces. He will be a President who is familiar with the civil defense situation from his service and observations in the Congress of the United States. As a Member of the Senate, whether it is Senator JACK KENNEDY or Vice President RICHARD NIXON, he will be familiar with the extravagance, the waste, the inefficiency, the confusion, and the stupidity of the paid officials of the civil defense agency, as now conducted, from ex-Gov. Leo Hoegh right down the line. He will know that these political has-beens should be removed from the public trough and should become in reality the political has-beens that they are.

The President who is inaugurated next January will know that the defense of civilians is a major factor in the defense of our country.

It is reasonable to hope and expect that the new Chief Executive, the new Commander in Chief of the Armed Forces, will next year end this wasteful drain on the Treasury and place civil defense where it should be—under authority of the Armed Forces.

At the same time I again express my admiration for those volunteer civil defense workers. They receive no salaries. They are the only ones of civil defense personnel who deserve praise for their work and sacrifices.

I thank the distinguished Presiding Officer for permitting me to exceed the 3-minute limitation, because I see that I have not used my stopwatch on myself.

THE RELIGIOUS ISSUE IN THE PRESIDENTIAL CAMPAIGN

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, I wish to say a word about the question of religion in this campaign, which is referred to in a very interesting editorial from a newspaper in Los Angeles.

The message which must go out to the American people very early in this campaign is that all four candidates are absolutely devoid of any "ism" connected with religion and that the people may vote their choice with confidence that the rights of every American in this connection will be respected and guarded by all four candidates. There is not and should not be any religious issue in this campaign.

The immediate occasion for my speaking is an editorial in the B'nai B'rith Messenger of Los Angeles, Calif., a weekly newspaper serving the Jewish community there. The editorial answers scurrilous and vicious rumors about one of the candidates, the Vice President of the United States, while at the same time taking the occasion to lay at rest any such idea on the subject of religion generally as it concerns all the candidates.

This editorial points out that various people—and it names some of them—have questioned whether Vice President NIXON is anti-Semitic—I have had letters to the same effect, Mr. President, and it is time to lay this whole question at rest, with equal force for every one of the candidates, three of whom serve in this Chamber.

The effort to inject a religious issue in the presidential campaign should be regarded by every American as an affront to his citizenship. It is regrettable that there will be such efforts and that bigots of every kind will attempt to spread their poison among the American people. It should be stated over and over again, however, that religious prejudices must have no place in this presidential year. Those who through ignorance or sheer viciousness repeat anti-Catholic and anti-Semitic remarks and rumors are doing the country a great disservice.

The campaign to charge Vice President NIXON, which the editorial reflects—if it be a campaign though I think it is only a lot of rumors of the most base kind—with anti-Semitism is a vicious canard about which there is not and never has been the slightest shred of truth. It was circulated during the 1956 campaign by Communist elements, and I regret that this kind of character assassination has cropped up again. Last year while in Warsaw, the Vice President made a pilgrimage to the memorial set up for the Warsaw Ghetto martyrs and there paid tribute to their bravery and love of freedom. The Vice President has also long been a friend of Israel. His most recent statement setting forth his position without equivocation is in reply to a letter from Label Katz, president of B'nai B'rith.

Let it be said finally, very early in the campaign, before it can become an important factor for discussion, that every one of these candidates is an American of the highest type. I am proud to be associated with them, whether Republicans or Democrats. I hope we shall never hear in this country any such base or vile assertion as that which is reported in the editorial.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the editorial be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

CHARACTER ASSASSINS GETTING EARLY START

The curtain had no more than run down on the Republican National Convention in Chicago when there commenced a series of inquiries to this newspaper.

Example: "Can you tell me," asked the lady's voice, "if it is true that Vice President NIXON stated, in an address, that the Negroes ought to be satisfied with their lot in the South; they're treated better in the South than they are in the North?"

Example: "Is it true that RICHARD NIXON is an anti-Semite?"

When a Jewish newspaper is flooded with over a hundred such inquiries, it is indicative that the character assassins are getting an early start.

About an hour before this piece was written, a responsible and respected leader in local Jewish life for about four decades, Mrs. Birdie Stodel, telephoned, and stated, in substance: "I attended a meeting of women last night, at which about 50 women were present, and one woman stated that she had documented proof that RICHARD NIXON is an anti-Semite. I answered her that 'that is ridiculous,' but she was so persistent that I thought I'd call you. She made a strong impression on many of the women present."

We advised Mrs. Stodel that if she wished to do her people a service, that she should telephone that lovely lady and tell her that she is doing our people a disservice by thus slandering Mr. NIXON.

There is no element of anti-Semitism in this campaign. Nixon, Kennedy, Lodge, and Johnson are absolutely devoid of that crass anti-Jew stuff called anti-Semitism. Vote for your choice with confidence that the rights of our people will be respected and guarded.

Yet, with so much slander against RICHARD NIXON being broadcast, we feel it our solemn duty to state, unequivocally, that no man in public life in America is more devoid of anti-Semitism than RICHARD NIXON.

Our advice to you: When you run into these character assassins, stop them cold; tell them that they don't know what they're talking about; that they are deliberate character assassins of a demonstrated friend of our people.

UNITED STATES-JAPANESE RELATIONS

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, on June 18 in the course of a speech on the Senate floor I said:

I am confident that the Japanese people wish further to pursue democratic government, are not prepared to reject it at the bidding of street mobs, place high value in their new-found friendship with the United States and, given the opportunity, will cultivate and develop it further. The whole postwar history of United States-Japanese relations bears out this view.

These remarks were made at the time of the student riots in Japan in connection with the United States-Japanese mutual security treaty, the impending visit of the President, the downing of the U–2 plane, and the failure of the Paris summit meeting. As a result of these words, I received one of the most beautiful letters I have ever gotten from a young lady in Japan, Miss I. Taniguchi, an office secretary, who works in Sahogawa, a district in the city of Nara.

The key paragraph in her beautiful letter is as follows:

When I was a little girl, I was deeply impressed by the high culture and manners of the American people. Since then, I have been studying "Facts About the United States." I love your country and respect you from the very bottom of my heart. It is my strong conviction that the only sure road to peace lies in understanding the ideals and ideologies, the hopes and dreams, the customs and culture of the people of other lands.

Mr. President, I do not think a poet or a great author could have written these sentiments more beautifully than this lovely young girl from Nara in Japan. The present Presiding Officer of the Senate [Mr. FONG] who has been in Japan on such a mission, will feel as keenly as I do the beauty, the sincerity, and the truth of these words as reflecting what is in the hearts of tens of millions of Japanese and tens of millions of Americans.

I should like to add a practical word.

The delicacy and deep sincerity of the sentiments in this letter are so moving and so typical of millions in both countries that I ask unanimous consent that her whole letter be inserted in the RECORD, as my best reply to Miss Taniguchi. Based upon this letter I was moved to put forward and implement an idea proposed to me by Harold L. Zellerbach, of San Francisco, president of the Municipal Arts Commission and chairman of the executive committee of the Crown Zellerbach Corp., and Mrs. Mary Lou Chapman, of San Francisco, that we can augment the reservoir of good will that exists between our two countries by inviting at least 100 of the non-Communist student leaders involved in the recent Japanese riots to come to the United States as soon as possible. They should meet with governmental and civic leaders throughout the United States so that they may be able to take back with them a true picture of the objectives of the American people and government.

I am engaged in sounding out the appropriate Government agencies and private foundations to see if such a "visit of 100" can be arranged. The whole idea remains as valid today as it was a few weeks ago for we know the Communist technique. They are letting Japan alone ostensibly at the moment, but the efforts to subvert that country are continuing increasingly and unceasingly, and if we only give them a few more weeks or months, they will be back creating the same kind of disorders in Japan, unless steps are taken against them.

When Commodore Matthew Perry sailed into Tokyo Harbor over a century ago, strong ties were established between the United States and Japan which were restored after Japan's tragic aberration in aggression in World War II. Today, our friendship with the Japanese people stands as part of the structure to the free world against the dangers of international communism to the freedom of the individual in Asia. The Communists continue in their chosen aim of seeking to wreck the free world through dividing it, but I am confident that the Japanese people are not prepared to reject democratic government at the bidding of street mobs. The majority of the Japanese, I believe, wish to cultivate and develop their friendship with the United States, and we should move with understanding and good will in the crucial times ahead. As the youth of Japan aspire to national leadership, mutual harmony and common agreement on peaceful goals will be of immense value in the continuing advancement of friendly relations between the Japanese and American people.

As a tribute to Miss Taniguchi, and in service to my country, I shall do my utmost to pursue the idea presented and to bring it to fruition.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that a letter from I. Taniguchi to myself dated June 29, 1960, be printed in the RECORD at this point in my remarks.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

SAHOGAWA, NARA-CITY,
June 29, 1960.

Mr. JACOB K. JAVITS,
New York City, N.Y.

DEAR SIR: I hope you'll forgive me for my boldness in writing to a great statesman, Mr. JAVITS, without any introduction. I am the luckiest Japanese student (I was graduated from Nara Shirahuzi Senior High School in 1958 and I am now attending Nara Typists' and Stenographers' Training School and Osaka English Conversation School, so I do not belong to Zengakuren, student organization) on the earth to be able to write a great U.S. Senator, Mr. JAVITS.

Well, I was so excited to read June 19 newspaper that you made a speech, "We support Japan politically and economically as usual." We, the Japanese people have no adequate words to express our deep gratitude to you for your speech. All we can say is "Thank you from the very bottom of our heart." We sincerely hope and pray that you'll accept Japan as your fast friend. We well know that Japan can do nothing without U.S. help. We are so happy that you well understand Japan. We sincerely hope that the United States and Japan will always be the very best of friends and close allies.

When I was a little girl, I was deeply impressed by the high culture and manners of the American people. Since then, I have been studying "Facts About the United States." I love your country and respect you from the very bottom of my heart. It is my strong conviction that the only sure road to peace lies in understanding the ideals and ideologies, the hopes and dreams, the customs and culture of the people of other lands.

Someday, I hope you'll visit Japan during the height of the cherryblossom season. In the Kansai area where I live, the first blossoms come out at the end of March, and gradually reach the height of their glory in the first week of April. When the sakura is in bloom, the entire country becomes transformed into a magical fairyland, and one can truly understand why Japan has gained the floral name of "the land of the cherryblossoms." To the people of Japan, the cherry symbolizes chivalry apart from the fact that it satisfies their esthetic sense. Hence, it has been the inspiration and theme of thousands of poems and songs. When you visit Japan, please stay at my home and enjoy Japan. We, the Japanese people welcome a great U.S. Senator, Mr. JAVITS.

Now, let me send you the most attractive Japanese doll for United States-Japan friendship, please. And I hope you'll like some post cards of Nara and a booklet of Japan I sent you.

We shan't ever forget your kind speech. Thank you many, many times. Our adorable U.S. Senator, Mr. JAVITS "please lead Japan."

I know you are as busy as a bee, but please drop me a line. I am most eager to get a letter from you. I do hope you'll overlook my many mistakes in English.

With deepest gratitude.

Sincerely yours,

I. TANIGUCHI.

"We like Mr. JAVITS."

Mr. SCHOEPPEL. Mr. President, I have listened to the distinguished Senator from New York, and I wish to associate myself with the statements and sentiments which he has expressed. I think it is high time, and I heartily endorse what he had to say about the candidates for the highest office in this country, and putting aside once and for all some of the vicious rumors that have been going around the country. I say to the distinguished Presiding Officer that I have seen letters along the same lines, casting aspersion on the record and character of the men who are aspiring to the high offices of our country.

Mr. JAVITS. I thank my colleague for his gracious remark.

Mr. KEATING. Mr. President, I wish to join my distinguished friends from New York and Kansas in condemning in the strongest possible terms the injection of any religious prejudice into this or any other election. Some of the literature which I have received, as I am sure other Senators have also, is enough to turn one's stomach with respect to religion as an element in the campaign.

As my distinguished colleague has pointed out, Vice President NIXON needs no defense from us as to his freedom from any feelings of that kind, and we know just as well that our colleagues serving in this body on the other side of the aisle are equally free from any such venom. I hope that as this campaign progresses, we shall hear less and less of the sort of thing which is referred to in the editorial presented by my senior colleague from New York.

PRESIDENTIAL NOMINATIONS

Mr. KEATING. Mr. President, the Washington Post in a very fine editorial this morning called attention to the failure of the Senate to confirm the nominations of Mr. Kintner and Mr. Bicks. The editorial is entitled "Stalled Nominations." This is a problem which is encountered not infrequently in the heat of political controversy, but certainly as pointed out yesterday by my senior colleague, and so forcefully and eloquently mentioned by the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. PROXMIRE], both of those men are experienced public servants who have done outstanding jobs and are deserving of early consideration. I sincerely hope that no feeling that someone else might be better in January will deter the Senate from acting on these two nominations.

I ask unanimous consent that the editorial be printed at this point in my remarks.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

STALLED NOMINATIONS

The slow motion that afflicts Congress in the confirmation of presidential nominations in the months preceding an election is of ancient origin. When the Senate is controlled by an opposition party, it is strongly inclined to the view that the next President could do a better job in filling vacancies than the incumbent. In general there is something to be said for this deference to the new Chief Executive; if all nominations were to be blocked, however, governmental service operations would be seriously impaired.

We can see no good reason for denying confirmation to the renomination of Earl W. Kintner, Chairman of the Federal Trade Commission. Democratic Senator PROXMIRE credits the FTC under Mr. Kintner's direction with having issued "twice as many antimonopoly complaints as in the preceding year," and Chairman MAGNUSON, of the Interstate and Foreign Commerce Committee, acknowledges that Mr. Kintner has done a good job. Yet it appears that he is to be denied confirmation on the theory that the new President should be free to select men of his own choice for such positions.

The basic policy here should be the continuance in office of an experienced Commissioner whose record has been good. The FTC is a bipartisan regulatory agency, not an adjunct of the White House, and the chairmanship rotates annually among the members. Nominations of this sort cannot be ignored by the Senate without sacrificing the national welfare to politics.

Robert A. Bicks, Assistant Attorney General in charge of the Antitrust Division of the Department of Justice by recess appointment, is in a somewhat different position. His nomination should have been confirmed when it was first sent to the Senate for the sake of maximum effectiveness of a vital agency. If the new President wishes someone else in the position, he will have only to ask for Mr. Bicks' resignation. But the nomination ought to be approved now in deference to the position and to Mr. Bicks' record.

More serious is the failure to act on seven judicial nominations. Two of these nominations have been pending since the 1959 session of Congress and another since January. With the courts literally crying for more judges, it is a grave disservice to the country to leave these posts vacant for the want of Senate confirmations. The fact that the administration has been tardy in making some judicial appointments does not excuse the Senate for failure to act on nominations once they have been made.

EDITORIAL SUPPORT FOR THE PROPOSAL TO ESTABLISH A JUSTICE DEPARTMENT CLEARINGHOUSE FOR INFORMATION ABOUT BUSINESS SWINDLERS

Mr. KEATING. Mr. President, it is a matter of great satisfaction to note the editorials appearing in a number of America's great newspapers endorsing the proposal embodied in S. 3530, which I introduced on May 11 of this year in conjunction with my distinguished colleague from New York [Mr. JAVITS]. This bill grew out of recommendations of New York's outstanding attorney general, Louis J. Lefkowitz, who has pioneered with vigor and courage in the field of consumer protection.

Under terms of S. 3530, the attorney general would be authorized to maintain records of fraudulent and other unethical business practice. This would make it easier for State and local authorities to keep track of business swindlers, and make it more difficult for unethical promoters to engage in fly-by-night operations set up in locality after locality throughout the Nation.

Although the creation of such a bureau world obviously cost some money, in my view this would be repaid over and over again in terms of needed protection for the great American consuming public. It is my firm conviction that proper safeguards for consumers will be one of the burning issues of the immediate future, and I regard the establishment of this clearinghouse as a modest and necessary first step in the great crusade which must be waged in this field.

The interest and support this proposal has generated is demonstrated by recent editorials in the Syracuse, N.Y., Herald-Journal and the St. Louis Post-Dispatch. I ask unanimous consent that they be printed in the RECORD at this point in my remarks.

There being no objection, the editorials were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Syracuse (N.Y.) Herald-Journal]

SET UP A CLEARINGHOUSE FOR SWINDLER INFORMATION

Senators JAVITS and KEATING have come up with a gambit that could make life less pleasant for the various swindlers and business phonies who victimize the buying public.

Under the current system they can move from State to State without much fear of recognition. All they need to set up shop is an honest face and a smooth tongue.

So the Senators, using an idea originally recommended by Attorney General Louis Lefkowitz, have proposed a clearinghouse for information about such characters. It would be set up in the Department of Justice and would make available, to public and private agencies, identities and records of the swindlers.

There would be the same number of gullible people ready to buy the Brooklyn Bridge or an oil well for a $10 bill (because it is true that one is born every minute) but at least the game would be played on more equal terms.

[From the St. Louis Post-Dispatch]

WHO'S WHO IN SWINDLEDOM

The clearinghouse for information about racketeers and swindlers which Senators KEATING and JAVITS, of New York, propose to set up in the Department of Justice seems to us an excellent idea. It will cost something to operate, but it should repay its cost many times over. And in doing so it would be supplying protection to the buying public and legitimate business which is now either lacking or inadequate.

The idea was originally recommended by the attorney general of New York, Louis J. Lefkowitz. That official pointed out that business charlatans, driven out of one State, often move to another and continue their fraudulent activities, being able to do so because the new community is unaware of their old record. Thus, said the New York attorney general, "We find ourselves in a merry-go-round situation."

A clearinghouse such as is proposed in the Keating-Javits bill would make available to both public and private agencies the facts about the operations of these racketeers. The very fact of its existence would exercise some deterrent force since the chances of getting away with crooked deals would be reduced by the spread of information. Rackets are booming today; it is a propitious moment to lower the boom on them.

PROBLEMS OF SENIOR CITIZENS

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, the rising proportion of our population which has reached retirement age presents a new frontier of major economic and social problems. We are just beginning to recognize how vast and complicated this terrain is, how many millions of lives it touches and how enormous the unfulfilled needs are.

Gov. David L. Lawrence, of Pennsylvania, who is himself past 65 and as vigorous in the performance of his job as many much younger men, has particularly interested himself in the problems of senior citizens. Under his leadership, Pennsylvania's programs in this field have been moving ahead rapidly. He testified before the platform committee of the Democratic Party on the urgency of developing dynamic programs to deal with the problems of the aging.

Last week Governor Lawrence spoke on this subject before the Eagles, the fraternal order which has consistently supported progressive legislation to help the elderly. Since the Governor's philosophy on the subject is so well spelled out in this speech, I ask unanimous consent for its inclusion in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the speech was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

REMARKS OF GOV. DAVID L. LAWRENCE, OF PENNSYLVANIA, AT THE 62D ANNUAL NATIONAL CONVENTION, FRATERNAL ORDER OF EAGLES, HOTEL FONTAINEBLEAU, MIAMI BEACH, FLA., THURSDAY, AUGUST 4, 1960

Any public official who accepts an invitation to address a group like this one almost automatically has a choice before him.

He may, if he chooses, take the easy way out—tell you how wonderful you are, recite a few feeble jokes and retire amidst equally feeble laughter and applause.

I believe I know the Eagles well enough to say that you are not that kind of organization. When you ask for a speech, you want something put before you which will challenge your social conscience.

As an Eagle in good standing for many years, I feel qualified to say that the only thing which really stimulates a convention of the brothers is a project in which they can genuinely interest themselves, and upon which they can act.

It is for this reason that I have chosen to discuss with you, today, the foremost social dilemma of our time: The gradually worsening plight of our older citizens.

There is nothing particularly new about the so-called issue of the elderly person in our society.

You and I were actively campaigning for improved social conditions for our senior citizens long before it became a popular issue, fraught with political implications and sociological drama.

I can remember—and I know that many of you here today remember also—those days in the early 1930's when the Fraternal Order of Eagles became the first "people's lobby" in the Halls of Congress in Washington.

The Eagles was the first fraternal organization to ask for passage of old-age pensions in the various States. When the 1933 National Eagles Convention was held, delegates looked proudly at the 20 pens used by the same number of Governors to sign pension plans into effect.

Those of you who were active in the order in the thirties remember only too well the fanatic, diehard opposition to pension planning. You will recall, too, that this had little effect on the Eagles, who spent time, money, and endless hours of energy in pushing for congressional action on social security.

When the Eagles—and others who joined in fighting for social security—won that battle, they were establishing a beachhead against poverty for all American citizens of advanced years.

It is true that the first Social Security Act covered only a portion of those who needed coverage.

The important victory, however, was in the establishment of a principle—the idea that government can and should help its citizens plan for the years after retirement.

The theory was classed by its opponents as another form of giveaway—a charge, incidentally, which has been leveled at every constructive form of social legislation introduced in the American Congress since the days of George Washington.

Quite the opposite, of course, was true. Social security was conservative, sound legislation. It was an investment in the future of the Nation, rationally conceived and logically executed.

Its flaws were not in its so-called excesses but, rather, in its restrictions.

The beneficial effects of the Social Security Act are clearly evident. It has meant the difference between abject poverty and a semblance of dignified independence for millions of older American citizens.

It is equally clear now, however, that we have solved only a part of the dilemma confronting the aging members of our communities.

That dilemma has rapidly become critical in recent years.

There are 16 million Americans 65 years old or older in America today. In just 10 more years that figure will rise to 20 million, according to the most conservative official estimates of the U.S. Government.

Today's vast army of the aging has brought with it acute and terrible problems which cannot be ignored. They are human problems and they must be given humane consideration.

Earlier this year, Newsweek, a highly responsible and generally conservative weekly magazine, studied Americans in their golden years. It discovered that the gold in those later years is something less than 24 karat.

One of the most significant handicaps retired persons must overcome, Newsweek found out, is the sudden drop in regular income.

Even for persons with private resources the total annual income is slashed from one-half to two-thirds on the day he retires.

The magazine points out that "these extra years are often spent on short rations" and then goes on to say:

"A retired homeowner living in an average suburban community needs at least $1,900 a year to satisfy his basic needs. In a city, he needs at least $2,300.

"Admittedly," Newsweek goes on, "these figures are hardly subsistence levels. Yet a full 60 percent of all people 65 and over have incomes of less than $1,000 a year; only 20 percent take in more than $1,000."

What happens to the retired person who, as Newsweek points out, is on short rations?

I cannot speak for all the States of the Union. But I can say that our experience in Pennsylvania has shown some alarming facts of life.

In our State—which has done as good a job as most in helping the aging meet their problems—there are now more than a million persons over 65. Well over 600,000 of them have incomes of less than $1,000 a year to feed, clothe, house themselves, and to pay for other necessities of life.

It is true that social security payments are made to a half million retired persons in this upper-age group in Pennsylvania.

But it is also true that these payments average only about $900 a year—an income which is pitifully and obviously insufficient to meet the skyrocketing cost of living.

Many of our elder citizens are left with no alternative. To avoid complete poverty, perhaps even starvation, they are forced by circumstance to apply for public assistance.

Our latest figures show that 25 percent of our old-age assistance caseload in Pennsylvania goes to men and women whose social security benefits are simply not large enough to guarantee them even the most primitive standards of health and comfort.

America, with its fantastic technology, its magnificent material comforts, its booming economy, and its superficial aura of social responsibility, has added yet another "disease" to the dilemma of old age. The disease is poverty.

Some partisan political prophets have tried to make us believe that we are in the midst of unparalleled prosperity.

But I can only say that when nearly 10 million of its older citizens are living under the constant shadow of poverty no nation can, in good conscience, consider itself "prosperous."

It is true that we have made some progress in our effort to update and modernize the social security system. We have, in some ways, tried to keep pace with the rapid rise in our costs of living.

Benefits under social security have been boosted from a maximum of $41.20 per month in 1940 to a $127 maximum today. The law now covers 59 million workers, compared with 29 million during its early years.

Even with the revised levels of payment, the cold truth is that social security, under present regulations, cannot be stretched to meet all the bedrock necessities of existence.

There are, of course, many reasons.

The first, and most obvious, of these is the constant spiral upward in living expenses.

We are paying more for everything today than we were 10, 20, or 30 years ago—more, as a matter of fact, than at any other comparable peak of prosperity in our economy.

By the time the average pensioner has paid for the bread, meat, and vegetables for his table and the roof he must have over his head he is left completely defenseless against any other expenses he may have.

The fact that the retired person is incapable of meeting the financial demands of modern society has a decided, and often disastrous, effect on his family and his community.

When he is forced to rely upon public assistance grants, the public taxload must be increased to take care of this new demand.

When he is unable to meet the routine expenses of housing, he is very often forced to live with relatives in crowded conditions and an emotionally unhealthy atmosphere.

Perhaps most important of all is the terrible dilemma of ill health during advancing years.

In the final analysis, there are human factors which cannot be shown in the cost-of-living charts. These report only on the everyday costs we all encounter—food, clothing, housing, and transportation.

But what of the pensioner whose health is suddenly broken, who must find ways to pay medical bills and buy drugs?

The retired person with insufficient income is left with little choice. The alternatives are few; each is unpalatable.

He may sacrifice what little dignity he has left under the present system and become what is callously called a charity case.

He may fall back, once more, on the resources of his family—even though those resources may already be heavily overtaxed by the costs of education, housing, food, and other common needs.

With hospital costs rising at the alarming rate of 5 percent annually in recent years, older men and women are literally taking chances with their own lives.

Statistics show that many of them are avoiding needed physical examinations which might unveil a serious—and, of course, costly—illness or defect.

This, then, is the sentence we have passed upon our elder citizens.

We have imprisoned them with the threat of poverty and the ever-present emotional uncertainty of human beings who do not know which way they may turn if real trouble comes.

No one can accurately estimate the nervous and emotional toll this uncertainty has taken. No one can say, scientifically, how much the wards of our mental hospitals have been swollen by the terrible intensity of financial worry with which we are burdening the parents and grandparents who gave us so much of our national vigor.

The tragedy of the aging in America today does not really end with these abuses.

As a Nation we are guilty of a far greater crime than the sentence of poverty from which there can be no parole or probation, without new laws and new action.

Our basic crime is a crime of attitude.

All of us, I know, are aware of the techniques of marketing which automobile manufacturers and others have made so effective.

The terrible fact of modern life is that we have, in effect, created a program of "planned obsolescence" for human beings. We have, arbitrarily and senselessly, created an age limit on the usefulness of human life. We have set down hard-and-fast rules. We have told our skilled, talented, highly intelligent workers that they may occupy positions of importance in business and industry until they are 65—and from then on we do not need their skills, their imagination, or their creative abilities.

An intelligent person would ask: Is it necessary that we discard old models in favor of newer ones—even when the old ones are still resourceful and valuable?

I can think of few rules of our society which are more callous, and less logical.

If we were to discard, automatically, the talents of older persons, the world—and especially America—would be deprived of some of its most energetic and creative leadership.

A brief glance at the record shows what I mean.

Some of the greatest esthetic writing of our century came from Bernard Berenson—a man who wrote much of his major work after 65.

The magnificient insight of Bernard Baruch has proved extremely valuable to three generations of American Presidents.

Robert Frost—considered by many critics to be the greatest living American poet—has published most of his best work in the 17 years after his 65th birthday.

The great British playright, George Bernard Shaw, wrote some of his most brilliant satire in the three decades between his 65th year and his death in 1950.

The list of elder citizens who have contributed immeasurably to our civilization is a long and impressive one.

It is lasting proof, I think, that there is no common sense in any system which sets up an enforced retirement.

For those of us who have followed this problem carefully, there are hopeful signs.

One of this country's major airlines has extended its retirement age to 68. One of our largest retail sales organizations now permits workers to remain on the payroll after 65, subject to performance studies every half year.

Some of our more enlightened officials have begun to reeducate public attitudes toward the aging.

There are good reasons.

Most important of these, I should say, is the increase in our life expectancy. Modern medical science and improved diet have caused a revision in our old attitudes toward retirement.

Authorities now tell us that a man or woman reaching the normal retirement age of 65 can now expect to live another 13 years as against 11 years at the turn of the century.

Serious observers of the problems of the aging are entitled to ask how the compulsory age of 65 years for retirement was first decided.

The answer is revealing—but not particularly reassuring.

It was back in 1889 that 65 was first mentioned as the proper age for retirement. It was proposed by Chancellor Bismarck of Germany as that nation began the business of setting up the first national pension system.

It seems fairly obvious, therefore, that we have not bothered to change our ideas about retirement age since the time of Bismarck—71 years ago.

I do not believe there is a need for drastic or revolutionary reconstruction of those ideas. I do believe that it is time our private organizations, our fraternal orders, and more specifically, our Government embark upon intelligent amendments to the program for the aging.

Fortunately, some constructive steps are now being taken.

Private industry first recognized the need for some form of pension plan nearly 85 years ago. The idea lay fallow in barren soil for a good many years, for it was not until the past decade that a systematic program of pension planning became an integral part of large industry's employee relations.

Today, according to Federal statistics, there are nearly 40,000 company pension plans.

There is growing evidence, however, that neither social security as it now exists nor private pension programs can meet all the requirements of the aging. Neither of the two can satisfactorily meet the problems of illness.

Because this is one of the new, bread-and-butter facts of life in modern America, both political parties have recognized the need for action.

During my own party's convention in Los Angeles, I asked to appear before the platform committee to urge strong and dynamic planning in several basic areas. One of those areas involves the many-faceted problem of what our Government can and must do to help the aging live out their lives in dignity and without poverty.

I would ask, also, that we revive our national spirit and revise our attitudes toward elder citizens.

I believe the Eagles have taken a long, constructive, and dramatic step forward in this direction.

If the public is reeducated, if the present-day prejudices are to be removed, I think we may thank, in large part, the "jobs after 40" program of the Eagles.

Some people might question the title of this project. Anyone who has studied the complex issues of employment in our mechanized society knows only too well what "jobs after 40" really means.

Increasing automation in industry will take an ever-higher toll in the years to come. When skilled workers are thrown out of jobs by new machines, the age factor is automatically lowered. Because of this, workers who have trained themselves in one primary field may find themselves jobless—and unable to find jobs—at 45 or 50, instead of 65.

The Fraternal Order of Eagles has taken one other highly significant step in recent years.

Planning for the future of its older members, the Eagles have constructed 50 units of low-rental housing at Bradenton, here in Florida. I know that Eagle Village, in the years to come, will emerge as an outstanding example of what a privately supported organization can do for its own membership.

Still, it is not enough.

We need to find new ways to improve health care for the aging. Whether this is through voluntary plans or through use of public funds will depend in large part on the people themselves.

We must find new ways to establish community facilities for our older citizens. Convalescent care, recreation, housing, employment and technical training—or reeducation—all of these are a part of the challenge we face.

Most important of all, we need to remember that the aging do not ask for charity—they want independence. They are not beggars.

Only the most criminal, hedonistic, and spiritually bankrupt nations turn their elders into the streets with tincups and tell them to shift for themselves.

America is not that insensitive.

Yet is it any less criminal to consign human life to the darkness of ill health and emotional destruction? Is it any less callous to imprison human dignity behind a facade of respectable hypocrisy?

We cannot discard human life as we would junk an obsolete motorcar. We cannot cut off human energy and usefulness as we would switch off a light.

The Fraternal Order of Eagles has devoted years of time and effort to the urgent problems of the aged.

Those years have been well spent and productive.

You have helped lay a foundation for action which must, and ultimately will, restore the aging to positions of dignity.

I know of no more worthy challenge. I know of no one group of people in our society which is more desperately in need of a strong voice in the cities, the towns, and villages of this Nation.

I know of no other single group which is more entitled to the dedicated services of the Eagles—an organization which I am proud to call, once again, "the people's lobby."

THE DEFENSE PROGRAM

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, Mr. Robert Hotz, editor of Aviation Week, a well-known trade publication, has written a perceptive editorial for the August 15 issue of that magazine concerning the current defense program. So that all the Senators may have the opportunity to read this important editorial, I ask unanimous consent that the editorial and an accompanying article be placed in the RECORD at this point.

There being no objection, the editorial and article were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From Aviation Week, Aug. 15, 1960]

DEFENSE BATTLE RAGING

(By Robert Hotz)

The executive and legislative branches of the Government are locked in a bitter battle over U.S. defense policies as the 86th Congress struggles through its final session. The outcome of this battle has an enormous portent for the future of this Nation, not only because of its influence on the Presidential election in the fall but also because of its effect on our fortunes in the long-term struggle against the Soviet Union. There has been some pretty bitter debate within the executive branch of the Government over the need for a major acceleration of the defense program (Aviation Week, Aug. 1, pp. 21 and 28), and President Eisenhower, returning to Washington from Newport, has called for some increases in key military programs.

In light of the President's bitter castigation of critics of his defense program with his "Job's boils" reference at the Republican convention in Chicago, it is interesting to note that he is now recommending most of the things these critics have been pressing for and has, in fact, thoroughly reversed his own stand of last January on such key issues as the B–70, strategic jet airlift, reconnaissance satellites and the airborne alert. If the "Job's boils" have stirred the President into sufficient study of these grave matters to convince him that changes in his decisions were required, then their efforts were indeed worth any personal discomfort they may have caused him.

We hope that the generals so bitterly assailed last spring by the President for their "parochial views," expressed in honest testimony given in response to congressional summons, will also take some satisfaction from the President's recent inclination toward their recommendations.

The President's new defense program was greeted with newspaper headlines proclaiming "Ike Orders Big Defense Boost," which is no doubt what Presidential Press Secretary James Hagerty was aiming for. However, on closer examination of the details involved in the President's message and the related action taken by the Defense Department, it becomes evident that there is no boost at all, one serious retrogression and a general vagueness as to the degree to which any of the programs cited by the President will really be accelerated.

OUT OF THE FOG

What emerges out of the fog of White House press agentry and Pentagon gobbledygook appears to be the following:

The President has merely authorized spending of a fraction ($476 million out of $1.1 billion) of the funds he had earlier impounded. Total of $621 million is still being frozen in the Pentagon according to documents submitted by the Defense Department Comptroller, while another $978 million in the original budget is "apportioned but undergoing further review," which is another Pentagonese phrase for "frozen." The $621 million still frozen just about equals the $661 million net boost added by Congress to its fiscal 1961 defense appropriation.

The President now recommends a course of action on key programs, such as the B–70, Samos, strategic airlift Army modernization, and airborne alert, advocated by the "Job's boils" critics of his original fiscal 1961 defense budget when it was submitted to Congress last January. However, as accurately as can be determined at this time, none of the recommendations on the projects is sufficient in scope to achieve the full objectives of each program within a time scale to achieve maximum military effectiveness. To use an old Army phrase, the defense program recommended last week to Congress appears to be "a day late and a dollar short."

The President presents as a military asset in his defense program a decision to retain a portion of Strategic Air Command's B–47 fleet originally scheduled for retirement because of obsolescence. We fail to see the military virtue in retaining a larger quantity of obsolescent aircraft still further into their period of declining military usefulness. The lack of difficulty experienced by Soviet all-weather interceptors recently in catching and destroying an RB–47 in a 200-mile stern chase does not inspire confidence in retention of this weapon even longer than originally planned. Not a word is mentioned in the President's defense message about expanding or accelerating the supersonic B–58 bomber program to provide a major increase in military effectiveness over the B–47 fleet. This program remains fixed at the relatively insignificant quantity of 3 wings of 45 aircraft each. Nor is there a word about accelerating KC–135 jet tanker production where a critical bottleneck in SAC's efficiency has been artificially created by a budget decision.

SOVIET TRUCULENCE

The increased Communist truculence in the past few months has been a predictable reaction to the budget-strictured U.S. defense policies of the past few years. Rightly or wrongly, it is evident that the Soviet leaders feel a shifting balance of military power enables them to abandon their so-called peace offensive and brandish their naked force at us in the crudest threats. We may have won the U.N. Security Council debate on the RB–47 case, but four U.S. airmen are dead from Soviet cannon fire and two are still held incommunicado in Soviet jails in defiance of every precedent of international law.

The state of the world has deteriorated too far and the state of our defense as the only solid bulwark against the spread of Communist imperialism is too important to be handled for short-term political effects. Both parties recognized this in their recent conventions by adopting defense platforms that denied a price ceiling on the security of this Nation and called for increased, accelerated, and courageous approaches to the defense problem.

The recent Presidential defense message to Congress is too transparent to carry much assurance for the American people whose future is at stake or deterrence to the Soviet leaders who are gaging our strength and determination as a basis for their own aggressive policies. To borrow a phrase from the President's Chicago speech, it "does such violence to my sense of what is right that I have difficulty in restraining my feelings of indignation."

PRESIDENT APPROVES DEFENSE INCREASES—DEMOCRATIC LEADERS CRITICIZE MODEST FUNDS RELEASED; BUDGET BUREAU KEEPS $621 MILLION IN "DEEPFREEZE"

(By Katherine Johnsen)

WASHINGTON.—President Eisenhower loosened the budget purse strings last week to finance acceleration of top priority defense programs—but not enough to placate top Democrats, led by presidential candidate Senator JOHN F. KENNEDY, Democrat, of Massachusetts, calling for a $2 to $3 billion a year increase.

In a message to the Senate on the opening day of its short pre-election session, the President reported increased funding for airlift modernization, airborne alert, the B–70 program, and the Samos reconaissance satellite program. Funds being released total $476 million. The biggest slice—$164 million—is for fully financing five fleet ballistic missile submarines instead of three, an increase previously disclosed by the Navy.

Expenditures, which reflect actual payments to contractors—rather than new contracts—and are indicative of the production tempo, will be increased an estimated $150 million.

Democrats quickly noted that the money being released on the approach of the presidential campaign was appropriated by the Democratic-controlled Congress over earlier administration opposition, and is being released only after prodding of Defense Department by Senator LYNDON JOHNSON, Democrat, of Texas, chairman of the Senate Preparedness Subcommittee as well as Democratic vice-presidential candidate (Aviation Week, Aug. 8, p. 30).

Democrats stressed that the administration is still keeping $621 million in defense funds in a "deepfreeze," plus an additional $978 million in a partial freeze for further review. They also complained than an explanatory letter from Secretary of Defense Thomas S. Gates to Senator JOHNSON gave much of the administration action a tentative tone.

PRESIDENT'S COMMENTS

On the $621 million freeze charge, the President commented at his press conference: "I know of no reason for anyone to say that I have decided not to spend this money. And to say that this money has been frozen is—the proposition hasn't even been put before me in those terms at all, whatsoever."

Pointing out that Assistant Secretary of Defense-Comptroller Franklin B. Lincoln, had confirmed the $621 million "freeze," Senator JOHNSON commented in the next volley: "It would appear from the President's statement, and I take it at face value, no one ever explained this to him. The President tells us that he was not informed that these funds would be impounded. Since the President did not authorize this to be done, then who did?"

Defense financial plans and apportionment charts submitted to Senator JOHNSON, along with the Gates letter, disclosed these details:

Frozen funds: The $621 million impounded by the administration under its August 9 financial plan includes: $181 million for Air Force procurement of aircraft, $50 million for Air Force procurement of missiles and $36.9 million for Navy procurement of aircraft and missiles. Under the previous July 7 financial plan, almost $1.1 billion was impounded, reduced by last week's action releasing $476 million.

Partially frozen funds: These are funds, totaling $978 million, which have been apportioned to the services by the Bureau of the Budget and the Department of Defense, but which cannot be used without final approval. Defense Department refers to this category as "items apportioned but undergoing further review." The $978 million includes $48.5 million for Navy procurement of aircraft and missiles and $275 million for Air Force procurement of aircraft. It also includes these research, development, test, and evaluation funds: Army, $62 million; Navy, $76 million; Air Force, $119 million; and Advanced Research Projects Agency, $149 million.

Projects being financed with the $476 million released last week are the following:

Airlift modernization, $48.5 million: Congress appropriated $194 million for interim modernization of Military Air Transport Service with modified C–130, KC–135, or similar aircraft. Defense Department earlier agreed to use approximately $150 million of this, and last week's action called for use of the remainder. In his letter to Senator JOHNSON, however, Gates qualified that the $194 million "will be utilized, in whole or in part, depending upon the specific programs to be determined shortly."

Airborne alert, $82 million: This almost doubles the $85 million requested by the administration for fiscal 1961 to develop an air alert capability for one-eighth of Strategic Air Command's B–52 heavy bomber force. In addition to the $82 million, Congress also gave the President blanket authority to use whatever funds he might consider necessary for an airborne alert.

B–70 program, $100 million: Gates explained in his letter to Senator JOHNSON that the "technical details" of this Mach 3 aircraft program "are still under study and the exact amount which can be properly applied to it during fiscal year 1961 cannot yet be determined. However, it is presently estimated that about $100 million of the congressional add-ons will be used." Congress approved $290 million in addition to the $75 million recommended by the administration.

Samos, $50 million: Gates' letter qualified that "while this program, too, is under technical study, it now appears that another $50 million will be utilized" in addition to $200 million provided in the administration budget.

Polaris, $164 million: This will still leave frozen $69.8 million in additional funds appropriated by Congress for the fleet ballistic missile program: $36.8 million for Polaris missile procurement and $33 million for long lead time items for two submarines. Congress provided for partial financing of seven submarines. The administration is moving forward with only five.

Congress made reductions in the $39.2 billion fiscal 1961 budget submitted in January totaling approximately $1.1 billion, and additions totaling approximately $1.8 billion. The net increase in defense funds voted by Congress was over $661 million.

Senator JOHNSON protested Gates' failure to include in his reply the specific shopping lists of the military services together with changes made by the Department of Defense and the Budget Bureau, so that Congress might have a clear picture of the specific projects for which funds had been withheld. The net $621 million impounded, he noted, approaches the $661 million net added by Congress.

The President and other administration spokesmen emphasized the fluid, changing nature of the defense program.

The President told his press conference he did not interpret the Republican platform pledging an intensified and courageous defense program as implicit criticism of his administration (Aviation Week Aug. 1, p. 28). On the defense platform drafted by Republican presidential candidate RICHARD M. NIXON and New York Gov. Nelson Rockefeller, the President observed: "I say one era or one period or one atmosphere might justify one type of action; another era, another atmosphere, might justify something else."

Volunteering denials of any element of politics in the move toward greater defense spending, Defense Department noted that in May, following the Paris summit failure, Deputy Secretary of Defense James H. Douglas testified before the Senate Appropriations Committee that the defense program "will have to be seriously reviewed and evaluated" (Aviation Week May 23, p. 26). Defense said last week's action was an outgrowth of this reevaluation.

In his Senate message, the President attributed the acceleration of key defense projects—as well as the recent deployment of additional aircraft carriers to the 6th and 7th Fleets, a halt on phasing out B–47 bombers from Strategic Air Command, and expansion of the number and scope of field and airborne exercises of ground troops—to "continuous appraisal of changing Communist tactics and attitudes." He observed that over the past month, "We have seen an intensification of Communist truculence.

"Indeed, the Soviet dictator has talked loosely and irresponsibly about a possible missile attack on the United States.

"An American aircraft has been attacked over international waters.

"The Soviet delegation has walked out of the Geneva disarmament negotiations.

"All of us know about Cuba," he said.

NOMINATIONS OF POSTMASTERS IN WISCONSIN

Mr. WILEY. Mr. President, I am glad to see in the Chamber the distinguished Senator from South Carolina [Mr. JOHNSTON], chairman of the Committee on Post Office and Civil Service, and also the distinguished Senator from Ohio [Mr. YOUNG], who commented yesterday in relation to the post office situation.

I listened yesterday to the explanation of the distinguished Senator from Ohio concerning what he thought were certain misdeeds of Republican Senators in the past. I believe he has missed the point. When I was speaking previously about the failure of the committee to report nominations for postmasters in Wisconsin, I had in mind, as I shall show, that both Senators from Wisconsin had agreed upon the nominations which the President had made.

The Senator from Ohio was speaking of the past, and was referring to the action taken by two Republican Senators after a Democratic President had made nominations. That is not the situation at present.

First, I repeat, there is no opposition to the nominations for postmasters in Wisconsin by either the distinguished junior Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. PROXMIRE] or me. The junior Senator from Wisconsin is a Democrat; I am a Republican. We have interposed no opposition to the nominations made by the President. I shall confirm that statement by placing in the RECORD a letter which Senator PROXMIRE has written to the chairman of the Committee on Post Office and Civil Service.

I fully appreciate the right of any Senator to object. In other words, if the distinguished junior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. KENNEDY] should become President, and he should submit nominations, next year, for certain postmastership vacancies, I would have the right to object. That right would be recognized. But that is not the case now. If the junior Senator from Wisconsin wanted to object to the nominations in Wisconsin, he could block the reporting of these nominations.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed at this point in the RECORD the text of a letter which the junior Senator from Wisconsin wrote to the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. JOHNSTON], chairman of the Committee on Post Office and Civil Service.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

JUNE 23, 1960.

Hon. OLIN D. JOHNSTON,
Chairman, Committee on Post Office and Civil Service, U.S. Senate, Washington, D.C.

DEAR SENATOR JOHNSTON: Referring to our conversation concerning postmaster nominations in the State of Wisconsin which have not as yet been confirmed, I am attaching the list furnished me by Senator WILEY. According to the records in my office, my card was returned to the committee on the date shown opposite each name.

It has not been my policy to withhold approval of postmaster appointments in the past, nor is it now. If an objection has been filed with your committee, it has not been done by me.

Sincerely,

WILLIAM PROXMIRE.

Mr. WILEY. Mr. President, I know that some folks are blaming the junior Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. PROXMIRE], but I do not want him to be blamed for something for which he is not responsible. I sincerely hope that the nominations which are on this list, which is now again made a part of the RECORD, will be favorably reported and confirmed. It will be noted that the nominees are mostly from small villages and small cities. With the exception of Madison, probably not one of the towns has a population of more than 5,000.

Mr. President, I respectfully ask the distinguished chairman of the Committee on Post Office and Civil Service to give careful consideration to the earnest request of one who, in his service of 21 years in the Senate, has not been in the habit of making requests, and whose junior associate makes no objection to the nominations, and to report the nominations, many of which have been in the committee, as one Senator said today, for 20 months without action having been taken.

The distinguished Senator from Ohio [Mr. YOUNG] has related the actions of certain distinguished Republican Senators when President Truman submitted nominations. I have not examined into that situation, so I do not know whether his statement is correct or not. My point is that the situation in Wisconsin is not analogous. In the case of Wisconsin, a Republican and a Democratic Senator have agreed on whom the nominees should be. Yet the nominations have been held up for some reason. However, senatorial courtesy certainly demands that when the two Senators from a State agree upon nominations, those Senators should be treated in the way that senatorial courtesy demands. That is the point I make.

Mr. YOUNG of Ohio. Mr. President, will the Senator from Wisconsin yield?

Mr. WILEY. I am very happy to yield.

Mr. YOUNG of Ohio. The distinguished and beloved senior Senator from Wisconsin and I are really not at variance at all. On Monday, when I made reference to the post office situation in Ohio, I learned at that time that there was an absolute dissimilarity between what happened in Ohio and what has taken place with respect to the nominations for postmaster in Wisconsin. I thoroughly agree with the statement made by the distinguished Senator from Wisconsin. It seems to me that when both Senators from a sovereign State, such as Wisconsin, agree and they so advise and consent to nominations made by the President of the United States, the situation is entirely unlike the one which existed in Ohio in the past.

Although I am not a member of the committee which has the question under consideration, it is my belief that there is no similarity between the two situations, so in reality I have not missed the point.

I may say again, as I said yesterday on the floor of the Senate, that I find I was in the right church but the wrong pew when I referred, on Monday last, to some Presidential nominations for postmasterships in Ohio, and to the fact that they were blocked by the Senators then representing Ohio. I inaccurately gave the years as 1951 and 1952. I corrected the information yesterday and stated that the years were 1947 and 1948.

In one way, I did not give adequate credit to the late distinguished Senator from Ohio, Robert A. Taft, frequently termed "Mr. Republican," and to my predecessor, the distinguished former Senator from Ohio, John W. Bricker, who in 1944 was the Republican candidate for Vice President of the United States. Apparently they blocked 82 postmastership nominations in 1947 and 1948, not 81.

I really do not have any complaint, because I roll with the punches and am not bothered by criticism, but it happens that during last year and the present year, the President of the United States has submitted certain nominations for postmasterships in Ohio. I have carefully scrutinized the nominations and the nominees. In 1947 and 1948, the distinguished Senators who then represented Ohio, the late Robert A. Taft and John W. Bricker, blocked 82 of the postmaster nominations made by President Harry S. Truman.

In the past I said it was 81. I regret that I was mistaken, and that I did not give those distinguished Senators adequate credit. They prevented the appointment of 82 permanent postmasters nominated by President Harry S. Truman. Perhaps all of the nominees were unfit; I do not know anything about that. However, Mr. President, I suspect that at least one or two of them were "good Joes" and very competent to be postmasters of their municipalities. But they never attained those positions, because action by the Senate on their nominations was blocked.

At that time a Republican newspaper in Ohio—and I do not complain about this, either—said that Senator Taft and Senator Bricker were "indulging in statesmanlike screening of political appointees."

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. BURDICK in the chair). The time available to the Senator, under the limitation, has expired.

Mr. YOUNG of Ohio. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that I may proceed for an additional half minute.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. YOUNG of Ohio. Mr. President, at that time we had a Democratic President and a Republican Senate. At this time we have a Republican President and a Democratic Senate. So far, I have not asked, in writing, that a number of postmaster nominations be confirmed. I will not ask in writing that they be confirmed, and I suspect we shall adjourn without their being confirmed by the Senate. If anyone wishes to criticize me for that, it is all right with me.

I said yesterday, and I say again, that I agree it was the high duty and responsibility of the late Senator Robert A. Taft and also of my predecessor, Senator Bricker, as it is now mine, to advise and consent to presidential nominations of this character. I have no doubt they performed their constitutional duty in accord with their consciences, as I am seeking to perform mine.

DIPLOMATIC TRAINING FELLOWSHIPS NEW AVENUE FOR TECHNICAL COOPERATION

Mr. HUMPHREY. Mr. President, the Carnegie Endowment for International Peace has announced an experimental program of training fellowships for young foreign service officers from 21 underdeveloped nations. Financed by the Rockefeller Foundation, the project will bring these young diplomats from nations as new as Togo and Cameroon to Harvard and Columbia Universities and to Geneva, Switzerland, for 1 year of study in international relations.

Anyone who has observed the debates in the United Nations in recent years must be struck by the youth of the delegates from the newer nations and the tremendous challenge these new diplomats face in negotiation and consultation with men of decades of experience.

The Carnegie-Rockefeller program is an admirable venture in cooperation with the newer and less developed nations to strengthen their diplomatic corps and assist each nation not only to achieve the fullness of its status of independence but also to contribute its fullest share to the cause of peace.

Mr. President, I think it important to observe that this program is financed and administered by private American sources and the training will be undertaken in two of our great private academic institutions. These young men will be trained in the discipline of international relations and the techniques of diplomacy, not in the propaganda aims of this or that nation.

The program is a positive demonstration of the concern for American private citizens and groups for the cause of peace. It is not a governmental program, but a program planned and executed by private citizens, and as such it cannot be subjected to that outworn Soviet propaganda claim of U.S. interference in the internal affairs of new nations.

Mr. President, I commend the groups and individuals who have developed this program and wish them and the young diplomats who will participate every success.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that a New York Times report giving additional details of the program be printed at this point in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the report was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the New York Times, Aug. 15, 1960]

DIPLOMATS' STUDY FINANCED BY FUND—CARNEGIE ENDOWMENT PLANS FELLOWSHIPS FOR 21 FROM UNDEVELOPED NATIONS

A $250,000 experimental program of diplomatic fellowships for Foreign Service officers was announced yesterday by the Carnegie Endowment for International Peace.

The project, which begins next month, will enable 21 young men to study for 1 year at Graduate Schools of International Affairs at Columbia and Harvard Universities and in Geneva. It is being financed by a grant from the Rockefeller Foundation.

Most of the 14 underdeveloped nations participating in the program are in Asia and Africa. Some, including Togo and Cameroon, have only recently become independent. Others, such as Cyprus and the British West Indies, have not yet achieved their independence.

Also in the program are Burma, Ceylon, Ghana, Indonesia, Jordan, Laos, Morocco, Pakistan, the Philippines, and Vietnam.

EXPERIMENTAL PROGRAM

Joseph E. Johnson, president of the Carnegie Endowment, explained that the 1-year program was experimental and limited in scope. He added:

"Although the endowment hopes that it can be succeeded by a more fully developed program in future years, no commitments can yet be made beyond the program undertaken this year."

A Carnegie official called the program an excellent example of the kind of thing this country can do best. A spokesman said none of the young diplomats would be indoctrinated, but it was understood that Communist attempts to train diplomats from the nations played a major role in the implementation of the program.

The youngest student is a 23-year-old West Indian and the oldest a 40-year-old Ghanaian. Most are in their countries' foreign services.

EACH GRANT WORTH $6,500

The grants are expected to cover living expenses, tuition, travel, and incidentals. It was estimated that the average cost per student would be $6,500.

The successful candidates were selected by an advisory committee of experts in international affairs from among candidates nominated by their governments. Officials hope to provide four more fellowships before the program begins.

The fellowships will be administered for the endowment by Reginald Barrett, a 47-year-old Briton who for the last 10 years has been in charge of the Nigerian offices in Washington and New York and an attaché for Nigerian affairs at the British Embassy.

SCIENTIFIC REPRESENTATION IN THE CONGRESS AND CONGRESSIONAL ACTION ON SCIENCE

Mr. HUMPHREY. Mr. President, the August 13, 1960, issue of Science Newsletter, published by Science Service, has an informative article on Members of Congress who have scientific background in the life or physical sciences.

I believe, that in the years to come, more and more scientists will and should seek a career of public service through elective and appointive office.

This is a scientific age. If America is to be adequate to the scientific challenges which have been thrust upon her, public servants should be able to bring to bear a scientific background on problems of public policy.

SOVIET "WINDOW DRESSING" IN LEGISLATURE

The Soviet Union estimates that 25 percent of the Deputies of the Supreme Council of the Soviets are scientists. We know, however, that these are selected from above as so much "window dressing" for purposes of the Soviet dictatorship.

The question is whether, through the free and independent action of the American people at the ballot box, scientists will increasingly rise to public position. Thereby, they will be able to represent that vast segment of America which is currently devoted to science and technology, as well as representing our people as a whole.

HIGH CALIBER OF CONGRESS PUBLICATIONS

Whether or not any individual Member of Congress has some degree of formal scientific training, I believe that it is one of the most striking characteristics of the postwar years that the Congress has become an expert source of scientific insight and information.

The scientific caliber of the reports of such committees as the Senate and House Space Committees ranks highly I believe, with the best of any publications issued by the executive branch or by any private scientific source.

More and more the congressional committees have dipped deeply into the pool of scientific knowledge.

TRIBUTE TO JOINT COMMITTEE ON ATOMIC ENERGY

They have been led in pace by what is universally regarded as one of the most successful groups in the history of the Congress—the Joint Committee on Atomic Energy—particularly under its distinguished chairman, the junior Senator from New Mexico [Mr. ANDERSON]—Members of the Senate and House on the Joint Committee have brought to bear upon the executive branch judgments which are both technically skilled and sound from the standpoint of public policy.

I ask unanimous consent that the text of the article published in the August 13, 1960, issue of the noted periodical, Science Newsletter, be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

SCIENTISTS ENTER POLITICS

(By Lillian Levy)

(Scientist-legislators in Congress lag behind Soviet scientist-legislators in numbers, but they are taking a leading role in national and international affairs.)

Science plays a major role in domestic and international politics today, but few representatives in Congress are scientists. More than 25 percent of the deputies of the Supreme Council of the Soviets are scientists, while only 15 Members, or less than 3 percent, of the U.S. House of Representatives and the Senate have had any extensive scientific training or background.

Two are Senators: Pharmacist HUBERT H. HUMPHREY, Democrat, of Minnesota, and Dr. ERNEST GRUENING, Democrat, of Alaska, a physician. The House has four doctors, three chemists, two pharmacists, two Members with degrees in forestry, one agronomist, and one psychologist. Representation on both sides of the political aisle is almost equal.

One-third of the scientist-legislators are active in foreign affairs and involved in problems ranging from world health to nuclear disarmament and the international aspects of space exploration. These include Senator HUMPHREY; Representative WALTER H. JUDD, Republican, of Minnesota, a surgeon; Representative MARGUERITE STITT CHURCH, Republican, of Illinois, a former consulting psychologist; Representative WILLIAM H. MEYER, Democrat, of Vermont, a forester; and Representative THOMAS E. MORGAN, Democrat, of Pennsylvania, a surgeon and currently chairman of the House Committee on Foreign Affairs.

Various factors led these scientists into politics, and many have found they favor the role of politician over that of scientist.

Dr. MORGAN, for example, found that he preferred dealing with the body politic rather than with the human body. He has adopted politics as a full-time career.

Unlike Dr. MORGAN, Dr. JUDD prefers dealing with the illnesses of the human body, mind, and spirit, because they are easier to diagnose than the illnesses that plague the "body politic."

Dr. JUDD said he felt dutybound to enter politics. As both a doctor and a missionary for more than a decade in the Far East, Dr. JUDD has a wide knowledge and understanding of the problems in that area. Before Pearl Harbor, he warned against selling scrap and other materials for munitions to Japan. After Pearl Harbor his neighbors remembered his warnings and proposed him for Congress.

On international affairs, his main concern is the threat and spread of the danger of nuclear war. Locally, he believes the health of the American Indian has been shamefully neglected and hopes to introduce legislation to correct this.

TRAINED IN CHEMISTRY

Also concerned with the threat of nuclear war is Representative FRANK KOWALSKI, Democrat, of Connecticut, a West Point graduate and holder of an M.S. in chemistry from the Massachusetts Institute of Technology. Trained in the art of warfare, he is the author of inventions with military application.

Yet Representative KOWALSKI has said: "If I have any objective, it is to see what we can do to achieve world peace."

He has seen firsthand the havoc wreaked by conventional arms in the bombing of Berlin and the awesome destruction of Hiroshima with the atom bomb. Others may question our military capability, but Representative KOWALSKI seriously questions the human capability for peace.

He has said, "I dont know if humanity is stable enough, intelligent enough or honest enough to accept peace; but if we don't want the horror of Hiroshima repeated times over, we'd better develop a capability for peace."

Like Dr. JUDD, Representative KOWALSKI also has had extensive experience in the Far East, where he was a military governor in Japan for close to 5 years, after Hiroshima. He now lends his experience to the House Armed Services Committee.

Representative MEYER led a House fight to pass legislation which would prevent transfer of atomic weapons to other countries. Active in research in forestry and land use until his election to Congress last term, Representative MEYER favors caution in developing nuclear power that may contaminate our lands and forests. He is an advocate of more biological investigation in pesticides and fertilizers as well as in atomic fallout.

PHARMACIST IS ACTIVE

Representative LARRY BROCK, Democrat, of Nebraska, pharmacist, is active in the area of interstate and foreign commerce dealing with licensing and sale of drugs.

Representative GORDON L. MCDONOUGH, Republican, of California, industrial chemist in the field of munitions and explosives, is active on the House Committee on Science and Astronautics.

Although maintaining his interest in science, Representative MCDONOUGH has put aside his professional career as a chemist for politics. So have nine other Members of the scientific minority in Congress. Those who have found political science the most satisfying of the sciences include the two Senators, HUMPHREY and GRUENING; Representative CHURCH, Representative MORGAN, Representative LEROY H. ANDERSON, Democrat, of Montana, a chemical engineer; Representative CLIFFORD GUY MCINTIRE, Republican, of Maine, agronomist; Dr. IVOR D. FENTON, Republican, of Pennsylvania, a physician; pharmacist Representatve CARL THOMAS DURHAM, Democrat, of North Carolina, who is vice chairman of the Joint Committee on Atomic Energy; and former forester Representative WALTER MANN MUMMA, Republican, of Pennsylvania, who said that he found his way "out of the woods a long time ago" and discovered that he "prefers political timber to any other kind."

Representative T. DALE ALFORD, Democrat, of Arkansas, an ophthalmologist and a freshman in Congress, still maintains his practice. Like his colleagues, he may frown on politics in science, but favors science in politics.

These scientist-legislators believe, as Representative MEYER has said, that "in these times, when science plays so dominant a role in world and national affairs, more scientists should enter into politics."

The legal profession presently dominates the U.S. legislative branch, numbering 60 percent of the Members of both Houses. Businessmen and farmers elected to Congress number about 18 percent. Newspapermen and teachers are less than 10 percent. The remainder, including 9 of the 11 women in Congress, come from a variety of professions and occupations ranging from ministers to morticians. Two of the women are lawyers.

The U.S. legislative makeup contrasts sharply with that of the U.S.S.R. The majority of the 1,378 members of both Soviet legislative houses are workers and peasants, with 831 (60 percent) included in these 2 categories.

According to Igor Bubnov, information officer of the Soviet Embassy in Washington, almost half of these deputies are actively engaged in agricultural production and industry.

But more than 25 percent of the Supreme Council are "working scientists," the Soviet spokesman said. This category would include engineers, agronomists, doctors, public health specialists, chemists, physicists, dentists, botanists, biologists, and representatives of many other science fields.

Lawyers are virtually unrepresented in the Supreme Council. Representative McINTIRE, Congress' sole agronomist, a member of the House Agricultural Committee and a farmer, said, "It is not surprising that lawyers are so little represented in the Soviet Council. In the totalitarian communist state, men—not laws—are supreme. The United States is a nation of laws, not men. Lawyers naturally would tend to dominate and lead in the government of a country such as ours."

While appreciating the function and need for lawyers in government, Representative McINTIRE pointed out that legal training by itself is not necessarily a qualification for a successful political career. Scientific training may be an even better preparation for Congress, he said, judging by the activity and political leadership offered by the scientific minority in Congress. In serving on their congressional committees, they have taken a lead in domestic and foreign affairs involving nuclear disarmament, test suspension, world health, and the national and international aspects of space exploration.

THE CRISIS IN THE CONGO—ARTICLE BY DAVID LAWRENCE

Mr. BRIDGES. Mr. President, the present crisis in the Congo points up once again that many so-called drives for democracy or independence in some nations end up to be nothing more than dictatorships under which people lose their freedom.

Columnist David Lawrence describes this process in clear, strong terms in his column entitled "Tyranny by any Name Is Tyranny," which appeared in the August 17 edition of the Evening Star.

Mr. Lawrence states that "there is no freedom for the individual in several of the newly created states in Southeast Asia and Africa."

The first thing these reform governments do, in many cases, he says, is to take away freedom of the press or freedom of speech.

Mr. Lawrence warns that the question might well be asked if the citizens in some of these countries might be better off under so-called colonial rule by the Dutch, the French, and the British, respectively, than they are today under untrained, uneducated, irresponsible leaders.

Because of his penetrating analysis of this situation, Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that Mr. Lawrence's column be printed in the body of the RECORD.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Washington Star, Aug. 17, 1960]

TYRANNY BY ANY NAME IS TYRANNY—COMMUNISTS AND DICTATORS HIDE BEHIND WORDS, BUT FREEDOM THEY BANISH FIRST

(By David Lawrence)

It has become the fashion in recent years to extol "nationalism" and to applaud the agitators for "independence" in colonial areas. In fact, "colonialism" has been downgraded as being almost as bad as, if not worse than, "imperialism." But the realistic truth is that what has been praised as a movement toward self-determination or self-government is turning out in many countries to be a new form of autocracy and tyrannical dictatorship.

For there is no freedom for the individual in several of the newly created states in Southeast Asia and Africa. Nearly every week news dispatches tell of more newspapers suppressed, and of individuals who oppose the existing regime being put in jail or forced into exile.

Whether in Ceylon or India or the new "republics" in the Congo or Laos or Cuba, the first thing a so-called reform regime does is to take away freedom of the press or freedom of speech. Some of the leaders are brazen about their disregard of democratic institutions. Thus, President Sukarno of Indonesia, according to dispatches this week, has "moved closer to absolute power in Indonesia." He recently dismissed the elected legislature and now has appointed a rubber-stamp parliament. He says to them:

"Democracy has not failed in Indonesia, but by continuing our revolution we have brought about the failure of liberal democracy. * * * We do not want fascism. That is why we brought liberalization to an end and replaced it with mutual-help democracy."

Words like "democracy" and "liberalism" have become meaningless in the parlance of the new group of dictators. There is only one word that should count, and that's "freedom"—which, of course, is promptly suppressed. Whether in Communist Russia or Communist Cuba, the claim is always made that "democracy" prevails. But there is no such thing as free elections—the true test of democracy. As for the newspapers, they are almost entirely under the thumb of the ruling dictatorship.

In Ceylon, for instance, the new autocracy has taken over virtually all the newspapers.

One of the first things done, moreover, by the new Congo Republic, formerly the Belgian Congo, was to expel the French and Belgian news agencies. The International Press Institute in Zurich, Switzerland, has just sent a message of protest to the Congo Minister of Information. Its full text follows:

"The International Press Institute expresses its deep concern at the threats uttered by the Minister of Information of the Congo against local newspapers which have dared to criticize the Government and against foreign correspondents.

"With regard to the local press, these threats have found expression in searches at the headquarters of indigenous newspapers and in the arrest of the chief editor of one of them.

"With regard to the foreign press, these threats have found expression in the closing of the offices of the Agence France Presse and of the Belga Agency in the Congo. The institute deplores these threats and measures which, together, constitute a grave threat to freedom of information."

But none of these protests seems to make much of an impression, even in the United States. For the Senate Foreign Relations Committee has just approved an aid fund of $100 million for the new Congo Government. Why shouldn't the Congolese think that suppression of the newspapers can be carried on with impunity, since the Congress of the United States appears to be ready to finance a dictatorship of tyrannical regime just the same, so long as it calls itself a "democracy"?

The Communist agents, to be sure, who stealthily steer the new "democracies" in their governmental operations are the first to urge that freedom of the press be abolished and a governmental press substituted.

Already the propaganda drive is on to destroy the independence of the Union of South Africa. Sir de Villiers Graaff, leader of the opposition party there, has warned that the East-West cold war could result in "military adventures" in Africa. He has just said to his party's congress:

"Communistic aspirations in the Congo will revive actively from the moment the United Nations forces withdraw, and even while they are there communistic influence will seek to build itself up in anticipation of future success.

"A vast African bloc is being established to the north of us and in that bloc the Communists are active. Many of the states forming that bloc are fluid and fomenting. They lack responsible leaders and responsible public opinion. Some are overpopulated and economically feeble. They form an area of conflict between East and West capable of arming itself and engaging in military adventures. Many of them make no effort to disguise their hostility to white states in Africa."

The question might well be asked whether all persons—white or brown or black or yellow—weren't really far better off under so-called "colonial" rule by the Dutch, the French and the British, respectively, than they are today under untrained, uneducated, irresponsible, leaders who have seized the reins of government in the so-called "independent" countries.

THE ACCOMPLISHMENTS OF THE POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT DURING THE REPUBLICAN ADMINISTRATION, 1953–60

Mr. BRIDGES. Mr. President, nearly every family in America is aware of the vast changes and improvements that have occurred in our postal service during the past 7½ years of the Republican administration. The U.S. postal service is probably the largest single enterprise in the world. It employs more than 500,000 persons. Since 1953, the Post Office Department, under the guidance of Arthur Summerfield, has compiled many new records in order that our mail service might be of increased benefit to all of us. And this had been done with a reduction of the postal deficit.

I ask unanimous consent to insert in the body of the RECORD at this point in my remarks a compilation of the various activities and improvements of the Post Office Department during the past 7½ years.

There being no objection, the compilation was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

The U.S. Post Office Department handles more mail than all the rest of the world combined. That makes it one of the world's largest enterprises.

During the 7½ years of the Republican administration, the introduction of modern business management and financial practices has enabled the Department to—

1. Reduce the postal deficit through operating economies and a more equitable postal rate structure. But for these steps the annual postal deficit of $700 million inherited in 1952 would have more than doubled by 1959. Instead, the deficit was substantially reduced despite increases in operating costs and a 20.2-percent increase in mail volume.

2. Bring about next-day delivery of letter mail within metropolitan areas serving 160 million American citizens.

3. Substantially reduce mail handling costs.

4. Bring closer to realization the next-day delivery of cross-country mail.

5. Provide city delivery service for the first time to 9 million families and 700,000 business firms and an additional 1,005 municipalities.

6. Extend rural delivery service to over 1.2 million farm families.

7. Establish a modern and efficient postal transportation system, using all forms of transportation to speed the movement of mail between all communities of the United States.

In addition, the Department has:

1. Continued to seek postal rates sufficient to cover all postal costs to the end that these costs would be borne by those who use the service rather than by the taxpayers.

2. Built more than 4,000 new post offices and embarked upon a 5-year program for completely modernizing the postal plant.

3. Successfully sought ways of mechanizing the postal operations to the end that service has been vastly improved, the productive effort of employees increased, and the efficient handling of future mail volumes assured.

4. Greatly strengthened the career service for postal employees and vigorously promoted salary increases and fringe benefits for postal employees wherever and to the extent justified in relation to living costs and industrial pay scales.

5. Initiated an intensified crusade to clean the mails of obscenity and filth.

6. Revitalized the philatelic program to make greater use of postage stamps to advertise American traditions and ideals at home and abroad.

These activities are described in more detail as follows:

SERVICE IMPROVEMENTS

The mail service to our people is being constantly improved. Mailers and postal patrons now benefit from more than 80 improvements in procedures.

1. Eighty-three metropolitan area plans have now been activated, directly benefiting 160 million people and covering 1,850,000 square miles. These plans provide means for next-business-day delivery of mail between post offices within each area.

2. The Department has developed a nationwide integrated postal service plan which links the metropolitan areas and assigned peripheral areas throughout the country with each other through coordination of mail handling procedures and transportation schedules. This will provide the guidelines for future development of facilities, transportation, and other postal planning.

3. Establishment of regional offices has decentralized and simplified administration and speeded service to the public.

4. Postal transportation terminals, airmail fields, and transfer offices have been consolidated with post offices, resulting in more efficient and economical operations.

5. Post offices in most major cities are open longer, and mail is collected later.

6. Careful surveys of window service at post offices and stations showed that consolidations could be effected during slack periods, without impairing necessary service, and service extended in busy periods. Significant manpower savings were made.

7. A program was initiated and expanded to many cities throughout the country to improve city delivery service through use of light, functional vehicles (Mailsters).

8. Extension of rural delivery services benefited 1,211,000 American farm families.

9. City delivery service was established in over 900 additional cities.

10. The increase in carrier service during the last 7 years has added the equivalent of 31,000 carriers to serve 9,011,000 more American families and upwards of 700,000 business concerns. The post office has kept pace with our growing cities and our expanding economy.

11. During the 7 years, 5,659 independent post offices were discontinued or converted to other type postal facilities, and delivery service was provided by rural or city carriers, resulting in an annual saving of over $8,400,000.

12. Combination mail service was established (November 28, 1955) permitting the mailing of a letter inside a parcel.

13. Certified mail was introduced (June 6, 1955) providing important benefits of registered mail, including proof of delivery, at lower cost.

14. More equitable surcharge rates for high-value registered mail, and elimination of nuisance surcharges, have reduced mailing costs on exceptionally high-value shipments, and more effective internal safeguarding procedures have been established.

15. The filing and settlement of claims for lost or damaged insured and c.o.d. mail have been greatly simplified and expedited.

16. A simplified money order procedure was instituted, reducing patron time and effort in buying money orders.

17. Use of mail meters was simplified and made more convenient to the mailer.

18. Standard directories for the 106 cities where the postal delivery zone system is now in use have been made available to business firms and the general public. This permits speedier delivery with less handling.

19. New and simplified information pamphlets help the public help themselves to better mail service through promoting readable addresses, better packaging, the use of zone numbers, separated and bundled mail for local and out-of-town delivery, and early and frequent mailing during the business day.

20. Seventy-two easy-to-use parcel post zone guides have been prepared for free distribution to mailers. These guides permit mailers at 2,200 post offices, where 70 percent of our parcel volume originates, to quickly compute and affix postage to their own parcels prior to mailing.

21. Establishment of 55 postal service centers at as many large post offices has served to improve management and communication procedures in mail classification and customer relations. Each of these centers is now able to give mail classification and related information to the smaller post offices in their area. This speeds information to the public.

22. Provision was made for installing 4,500 automatic stamp-vending machines in lobbies of post offices to augment window service during regular business hours and to make it possible for mailers to purchase stamps when service windows are closed.

23. A revised work measurement system was established for post offices which combines, with the Department's historic systems, a new concept of individual measurement introduced in early 1960. This permits each man to pace himself and results in faster and less costly service.

TRANSPORTATION

Transportation policies and practices have been geared to today's commercial transportation system and to the rapid changes taking place. Expenditures for transportation have been reduced substantially in per unit cost of service performed since 1953. Some of the major areas of advancement include:

1. A nationwide postal transportation study, the first of its kind since 1921, resulted in a nationwide integrated postal service plan (also referred to under service improvements). This plan is being used by the Department to weld the various transportation media, distribution centers, and post offices into the most up-to-date postal service system.

2. Combination highway - rail - highway service has been developed with large vans serving alternately on rail or highway. "Rail-van," "flexivan," and standard "piggyback" operations are being conducted on four railway systems operating in Illinois, Iowa, Wisconsin, Michigan, Minnesota, and South Dakota. Other types of containers for use on planes, trains, trucks, and steamers are being developed.

3. Since 1953, 300 truck routes have been added to meet compelling needs where rail service is no longer adequate.

4. Airlift of approximately 1.6 billion pieces annually of regular first-class mail over major truck air routes provides improved service. Postal patrons in all 50 States and the District of Columbia are benefiting.

5. A system of paying only for space used on trains has eliminated the prior practice of paying for a substantial amount of space ordered but not used.

6. Special trains exclusively for mail and express have been established by seven railroads, at the Department's request, on schedules advantageous to the postal service, thus improving mail transportation for several metropolitan centers including Chicago, Detroit, St. Paul, Boston, Albany, New York, and Washington.

FINANCIAL IMPROVEMENTS

Postal rates have been raised and procedures have been streamlined and modernized for handling the flow of cash, and for budgeting, accounting, and financial reporting.

1. The Congress enacted Public Law 85–426, sponsored by the Department. In title I, postal policy, the Congress stated for the first time an overall postal rate policy. In title II, postal rate increases, the first general increase in rates in more than two decades was achieved.

2. Accounting functions have been centralized and mechanized in 15 regional controller offices at substantial overall financial savings. This has relieved postmasters of accounting, payrolls, and other fiscal duties and permits them to devote much more time to the operational demands of their post offices.

3. A direct-to-bank deposit plan was designed and installed nationwide, resulting in significant cost reductions. All post offices now deposit their surplus cash directly with Federal Reserve banks.

4. An improved cost accounting system permits better utilization of the 35,000 motor vehicle fleet.

5. Advance partial payments to railroads and air carriers were discontinued, which, with other procedural changes, have made current the submission and settlement of carriers' claims. Previously, the lag in full settlement for some cases was 2 years.

6. Money-order forms and issuance procedures have been simplified resulting in substantial reduction in issuing and subsequently handling the 300 million orders annually. Print-punch machines will shortly be supplied to all points of issue, thus eliminating human error in processing, reducing possibilities of fraudulent altering and applying latest processing techniques to accounting.

IMPROVING POSTAL FACILITIES

The introduction of modern, businesslike real-estate practices and practical engineering concepts is changing the appearance of the Nation's postal facilities along with patrons' service and the postal workroom areas.

1. During this administration, private industry constructed or will have contracted to construct more than 4,300 new postal facilities, through employment of $185 million in private capital, for lease to the Department. These facilities remain under private ownership and the owner pays local real-estate taxes.

2. In addition to new facilities, the Post Office Department's program of modernization and improvement is reflected in interior changes in many facilities throughout the Nation. Workroom space is being redesigned to accommodate new equipment for mechanizing mail processing, a standard feature of all new major mail handling facilities, thus assuring greatly improved mail service to patrons and more pleasant and healthful working conditions for postal employees. New counterlines, mechanical salesmen for postage stamps, postal cards, and airmail sheets, service areas available to the public 24 hours a day for the purchase of stamps, and elimination of old Victorian-type, floor-to-ceiling screenlines, are making the lobby of today and tomorrow a pleasant place to do business.

3. Mechanical mail-handling systems have been installed in 15 major mail-handling facilities and bids are being considered for the installation of mechanical mail-handling equipment in 14 others to expedite the flow of mail from receipt to dispatch. Through mechanization much of the tedious manual labor of mail handling is eliminated.

4. All vehicles procured since 1953 have been of standard commercial design at a large cost saving. At the present time, 85 percent of the fleet is composed of lightweight, highly maneuverable vehicles. More than 8,300 older, expensive-to-operate vehicles have been retired from the fleet.

5. The fleet of three-wheel, gasoline-powered mailsters, now a familiar carrier conveyance throughout the Nation, will soon be supplemented by the addition of a limited number of newly developed electric mailsters and parcel post delivery trucks.

6. The adoption of the red, white, and blue color scheme easily distinguishes collection boxes from carrier relay boxes; on vehicles, the white top decreases heat, the blue lower portion reduces cleaning costs, and the red reflective strip increases visibility to other drivers, thus reducing accidents.

7. From January 1958 through June 1959, hours of vehicle service increased 55 percent, miles of service 80 percent, and the number of post offices served by these vehicles doubled, with a fleet which has increased by only 60 percent.

8. A postal modernization fund was authorized by the Congress for the necessary improvements and extensions to our physical plant. The Department plans to make these extensions capable of handling the mail 20 years from now.

PERSONNEL IMPROVEMENTS

1. The Department actively participated in developing a modern postal pay system and has consistently supported wage increases whenever and to the extent justified. Culminating months of work, Public Law 68 was enacted June 10, 1955, providing the more than 500,000 postal field employees with fair wages, incentive to advance in the career service, and compensation directly related to the duties performed, based on sound salary structure. During the ensuing 5 years, the flexibility of this system has been demonstrated frequently, most recently in the transition from manual to machine mail processing at several large post offices, by permitting the establishment and ranking of many new positions without disruption of the basic pay structure.

2. Active support also has been given to worthwhile fringe benefits such as Federal employees' life insurance, more liberal retirement annuities, uniform allowances, and the new health benefits now being installed. Nearly 500,000 postal employees participate in the life insurance program, and almost as many are expected to take advantage of the new health benefits.

3. The nationwide safety program, initiated in 1954, has consistently reduced motor vehicle accidents and has been recognized by the National Safety Council in citation awards for outstanding contribution to traffic safety in each of the past 5 years. Industrial accident and fire prevention programs have also been developed with a substantial reduction in disabling injuries and fire losses.

4. A comprehensive training program has been utilized to develop employee capabilities in mail processing, safe work practices, and specialized technical subjects such as equipment maintenance and operation of new mechanized mail processing equipment. Postmasters and supervisors have been instructed in improved supervisory practices to assure better utilization of manpower resources.

5. The employee suggestion system was decentralized and procedures streamlined to assure effective, prompt consideration of employee ideas. During this administration, more than 200,000 employee ideas have been received and more than 20,000 have been adopted. In addition, over 5,000 employees have been recognized for their outstanding accomplishments through cash and honorary awards.

6. Efforts to attract and retain well qualified employees have succeeded. Ninety-six civil service boards of examiners, staffed with postal personnel at strategic locations throughout the Nation, have improved the quality of applicants selected and provided a reservoir of eligibles for appointment as the need arises. During fiscal 1960, almost 1 million applications for postal employment have been received. Modern testing techniques are being employed to determine employees' skills and to facilitate selection and promotion. An executive development program was inaugurated in December 1959 to meet long-range executive personnel requirements and to improve opportunities for career development and advancement among postal personnel.

7. Improved employee-management relations have been developed through the establishment of an Office of Special Assistant for Employee Relations in the Bureau of Personnel. Procedures and policies established have contributed materially to improved relations with national and local representatives of employee organizations. Effective employee grievance and appeals procedures assure prompt attention to employee problems.

LEGAL SERVICES

1. New rules have been promulgated for the administrative handling of fraud and obscenity cases, permitting speedier determination of issues while conforming to recent judicial interpretations of the Administrative Procedure Act.

2. A board of contract appeals was established which has final administrative authority to resolve disputes concerning appeals by contractors from decisions by contracting officers.

3. Commercial insurance-type office procedures have been instituted for adjudicating and settling claims filed by private citizens, drastically reducing the time required to settle such claims.

4. Substantial success has been achieved in securing enactment of legislation to revise the maze of archaic and confusing laws which prevented the Postmaster General from operating effectively and economically.

INSPECTION SERVICE

1. The Department has stepped up its campaign to control the alarming increase in mail fraud schemes and in the volume of pornography in the mails. An all-out offensive has been instituted against these nefarious multi-million-dollar businesses under nationally coordinated programs which provide for close coordination with the Department of Justice and the U.S. attorneys throughout the country. So far during this administration, arrests dealing with the fraud and obscenity statutes have increased 84 percent. Indications are that the previous record high of 8,859 arrests for all offenses, achieved in 1959, will be exceeded this year. Convictions of offenders brought to trial continue at a rate exceeding 98 percent.

2. During fiscal 1959, the Department completed 111,079 miscellaneous investigations and 52,387 audit inspections. This has meant 10 percent more miscellaneous investigations and 27 percent more audit inspections than were accomplished in fiscal 1953. Investigations during 1959 under the tort claims procedures developed evidence in 178 major suits against the Government, which permitted settlement for $5,749,215 less than the aggregate amounts demanded by plaintiffs.

3. A broadened and more comprehensive internal audit program continued to produce improved benefits, combining continuous interchange of information between postal inspectors and internal auditors and joint consideration and evaluation of particular operating problems.

MECHANIZATION, RESEARCH, AND ENGINEERING

A coordinated, broad-gage research and engineering program for mechanizing mail handling was inaugurated for the postal service. Highlights of advances made in this program include:

1. Construction of the world's first completely mechanized post office began at Providence, R.I., with site-dedication ceremonies on April 2, 1959. This multi-million-dollar post office will make possible for the first time in the United States the complete mechanization of a working post office in a metropolitan area, handling all the functions of a conventional post office, while serving as a laboratory for advanced experimentation in mail handling methods and systems. A second facility of similar general character, contemplating even more advanced techniques in mechanization, is under planning at Oakland, Calif.

2. The transmission of letter mail by electronic means has been successfully tried and will be given a full-scale demonstration early this fall between Washington and Chicago.

3. Letter-sorting machines have been developed and installed in several post offices.

4. Work is well advanced on developing address coding through the use of phosphorescent inks and magnetic materials, which will eventually enable letters to be coded and subsequently sorted by machines more speedily than by hand.

5. A machine to read addresses without aid of human eyes and to sort letters electronically without aid of human hands is in an advanced stage of development.

6. Machines have been developed which will automatically face letter mail and cancel stamps.

7. Systems have been developed to move mail by electrically driven conveyors and to eliminate wheeled and castered tables, trucks, and trays on the workroom floor.

8. Four types of semiautomatic parcel-sorting machines have been developed and are being tested at post offices.

9. Postage-vending equipment has been developed and installed in large post offices. Work is also being completed on an automatic postal substation which will vend not only stamps of several denominations but envelopes, post cards, writing paper, and booked stamps. This will make change not only for coins but also for paper money.

PUBLIC RELATIONS

1. No efforts have been spared to help the public make more effective use of postal services. Improvements in the mail service and new services have been continuously publicized in the press, in magazines, by radio and television, films and informational pamphlets, and by departmental representatives in speeches and public appearances.

2. A seven-member Citizens' Stamp Advisory Committee, comprising prominent artists, philatelists, and a representative of the U.S. Information Agency, has functioned efficiently in advising the Department on the selection and design of postage stamps. Every effort has been and is being made to issue commemorative postage stamps possessing genuine cultural and educational worth which will promote American ideals at home and abroad.

3. The Department has conducted during the past year an intensive nationwide crusade against obscenity in the mails particularly that directed toward children. Most national civic, parental, teacher, and religious groups have endorsed this crusade and are giving it their active support. Congressional support is also widespread, and more effective legislation assuring mandatory prison terms for dealers in obscenity is expected from the present Congress.

4. The need for increased postal rates has been emphasized through press, radio, and TV outlets.

ACCOMPLISHMENTS OF THE FEDERAL AVIATION AGENCY UNDER THE REPUBLICAN ADMINISTRATION

Mr. BRIDGES. Mr. President, in the years since the close of World War II, air transportation has become a major industry affecting all aspects of our national life. The first fully independent Federal body devoted entirely to the regulation and promotion of the aviation industry—the Federal Aviation Agency—was set up by the Federal Aviation Act of 1958 under the sponsorship of the Republican administration.

In the short time since its organization on January 1, 1959, this Agency has done a great deal to restore to air transportation the same degree of public confidence that has existed for other forms of travel. I ask unanimous consent to place in the body of the RECORD at this point in my remarks a compilation of the various activities and regulations adopted since the creation of the Federal Aviation Agency.

There being no objection, the compilation was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

ACCOMPLISHMENTS OF THE FEDERAL AVIATION AGENCY UNDER THE REPUBLICAN ADMINISTRATION

(A report prepared personally for the chairman of the Senate Republican policy committee, U.S. Senator STYLES BRIDGES, of New Hampshire)

In the years since the close of World War II, air transportation has become a major industry affecting all aspects of our national life. Recognizing the obligation of the Federal Government to foster the orderly development of civil aviation, both commercial and private, the Republican administration provided the leadership which resulted in the enactment of the Federal Aviation Act of 1958 creating the Federal Aviation Agency—the first fully independent Federal body devoted entirely to the regulation and promotion of the aviation industry.

On January 1, 1959, the new Agency absorbed the functions and personnel of the Civil Aeronautics Administration and the Airways Modernization Board, as well as certain duties formerly performed by the Civil Aeronautics Board.

The basic intent of the administration and of Congress was to establish an organization with sufficient power—both of persuasion and by means of appropriate regulations—to restore to air transportation the same degree of public confidence as existed for other forms of travel. A former Air Force general, E. R. Quesada, who had demonstrated an intense interest in measures to advance air safety, was named by President Eisenhower to head the new Federal Aviation Agency.

We recall that the difficulties confronting all segments of the aviation industry were beginning to assume crisis proportions during the early and mid-1950's. Accident rates were on the rise. Burgeoning ownership of aircraft, both commercial and private, thus greatly increasing the use of existing airspace and all types of aviation facilities, created a pressing need for immediate action.

Greatly expanded programs to provide adequate air navigation and air-traffic control facilities were essential. Revised air traffic rules and procedures were assigned a high priority.

Other regulations, some of which have been adopted as many as 30 years ago, required review in order to meet present and anticipated needs. New aircraft and technical advances brought about the necessity for developing regulations in fields where formal rules hitherto were unneeded.

All such important areas have received attention from FAA and accelerated activity may be expected now that the Agency has achieved a state of organization which will permit it to fully discharge its responsibilities. Among the more important regulations adopted since the Agency was created are the following:

1. No individual who has reached his 60th birthday shall be utilized or serve as a pilot on any aircraft while engaged in air carrier operations;

2. Improved training and proficiency tests for copilots of commercial aircraft;

3. Mandatory weather radar for commercial aircraft;

4. New private and commercial pilots required to demonstrate a knowledge of instruction in instrument flying;

5. Uniform standards of flight instruction established in all flying schools;

6. Medical standards strengthened so as to prohibit from operating aircraft persons with histories of diabetes mellitus requiring insulin, coronary artery disease, psychosis or certain other mental or nervous diseases, chronic alcoholism, drug addiction, or epilepsy;

7. Private pilots required to receive their medical examinations from FAA-designated medical examiners.

As indicated by the first, sixth and seventh items listed above, the Agency has greatly expanded its medical program. Recently, a Bureau of Aviation Medicine was established within the Agency in recognition of the new importance of certain medical problems as they relate to the operation of aircraft.

Simultaneous with strengthening the regulatory area of the Agency's functions, Administrator Quesada was determined that enforcement measures should be similarly improved. Quite obviously, good regulations can be ineffective, if they are not observed by those to whom they are directed. While insisting upon absolute fairness in enforcement procedures, the Administrator nonetheless seeks to improve upon the rather lax practices which were followed in previous years.

In this connection, the Agency has placed its safety inspectors on a round-the-clock schedule in a concentrated safety inspection of all scheduled air carrier training programs and flight operations. As an example of this increased emphasis on compliance, FAA has ordered its flight inspectors to enforce the requirements that flight crew members remain at their duty stations during flight unless their absence is absolutely necessary.

During 1959, the Agency undertook approximately 3,000 enforcement actions against persons engaged in various aviation pursuits. In many cases, civil penalties, certificate revocations or suspensions, and reprimands were imposed.

The FAA is becoming increasingly active in the field of airport development. In order to improve the effectiveness of the existing Federal-aid airport program, which provides financial assistance on a matching fund basis to local communities for airport improvement purposes, the Agency has established a revised system of priorities whereby safety items of greatest demonstrated need receive preference in allocating the funds available.

During fiscal year 1959, FAA approved grants for 436 airport projects involving over $73 million in Federal funds. As of December 31, 1959, a total of 1,050 projects were under firm contract or grant agreement. For fiscal years 1960 and 1961, Federal grants of well over $100 million for about 600 projects have been authorized. Since 1953 over $380 million has been spent, obligated, or programed. Major advances have been realized in improving the Nation's airports.

It is evident that all functions of the Federal Aviation Agency are directly related to the promotion of air safety. In its activities, however, the Agency does not seek to retard the healthy growth of the aviation industry. On the contrary, the Agency is dedicated to fostering the continued development of air transportation—both private and commercial.

As an example of the flexibility which FAA must maintain in order to meet new advances in the aviation industry, we may refer to the advent of the turbojet transport in air commerce. By the end of 1959, the Nation's airlines were operating more than 75 pure jets. During 1960 the carriers will add an additional 150. The introduction of these new high performance aircraft was accomplished with a minimum of incident and mishap. A total of 28 U.S. airports now handle large jet transports.

The Federal Aviation Agency has sought to aline its safety programs to the expansion of jet travel. Last year, for instance, the Agency inaugurated a new program of jet flight training for its flight inspectors. This program—conducted by the Air Force at the request of FAA—has provided Agency inspectors with the finest jet training available anywhere in the world.

The rapid increase in jet operations has been important in a number of the changes in rules and regulations affecting air carriers which have been adopted in recent months. As aircraft become larger, faster, and more complex, the public interest demands maximum performance standards for all manufacturing, maintenance, and operating personnel.

In still another step to keep pace with the expansion of jet travel, FAA has established 30 new high altitude jet route segments totaling 25,455 miles. Radar surveillance for these civil jet operations was accomplished when the military permitted FAA to man and utilize 38 Air Defense Command long-range radars.

This arrangement is a typical example of the present close relationship which exists between the Agency and the armed services in solving mutual problems. The Federal Aviation Act fully authorizes such close cooperation—particularly in airspace and air traffic control matters.

The coverage provided by the ADC radars supplements FAA's own existing long-range radar to provide nationwide radar advisory service. The combined military-FAA radar system enables Agency personnel to track all jet flights from takeoff to touchdown with the exception of a small area in the Rocky Mountain region.

During 1959, the new turbojet aircraft contributed to a 14-percent increase in the revenue passenger miles flown by the Nation's airlines last year. The total of approximately 35.8 billion was 4½ billion revenue passenger miles over the comparable figure for 1958.

The expansion of jet service was accompanied by a similar growth in all fields of aviation. For example, the number of student pilot certificates issued by FAA rose from 58,107 for 1958 to 67,714 for 1959—an increase of 17 percent.

The upward trend also is reflected in the increasing volume of air traffic. During 1959, seven FAA towers reported their typical busy hours showed an average of nearly one scheduled airline landing or takeoff per minute. These busy hour averages do not include nonscheduled operations.

To meet the needs of this expanding volume of air traffic, the agency expanded its air traffic control system by commissioning a new navigational aid or air traffic management facility at the rate of one a day for a total of 365 for the year. These included, in part, 72 approach light systems, 11 new airport traffic control towers, 18 long-range radars, 9 precision approach radars, and 2 airport surveillance radar units. Also during the year, FAA contracted for the construction of 6 new air route traffic control buildings, and 1 new traffic control center building was put in service at San Antonio, Tex.

Early in 1959, the Agency set up a new airspace management program which made available over 6,000 miles of new air space for civil aviation. At the close of the year, more than 100 areas were under FAA review for revocation or reduction in size, height, or hours in use.

Also, during its first year, the Agency installed new electronic computers at six of its busier air traffic control centers. At the same time, FAA scientists and engineers received delivery of the first components of a new fully automated air traffic control system. This giant computer, called data processing central, will handle all the repetitive, non-decision-making functions of the air traffic controller. Its most spectacular function, however, is its ability to probe, detect, and predict conflicts or collision courses.

FAA engineers also completed plans for the introduction of automatic landing into the national system of aviation facilities. After final development and thorough testing, all-weather landing is expected to be in operation in 5 years. Planes will be able to land in all types of weather regardless of visibility conditions.

Testing of the automatic landing system is being carried on at FAA's Atlantic City, N.J., test center—the first such installation to serve civil aviation exclusively. A former naval air station, now known as the National Aviation Facilities Experimental Center, the center is equipped with laboratories, model shops, computer facilities and other types of instrumentation needed to carry out the vital testing and evaluation of new systems and equipment related to air safety. Just recently, as a result of tests at NAFEC, FAA has proposed the adoption on a nationwide basis of a new runway lighting system.

At the present time, the Agency is engaged in building the most modern jet-age airport in the world to serve the metropolitan Washington area—Dulles International Airport—named in honor of our late Secretary of State. The construction work on the project is proceeding at a rapid pace. Paving of the two north-south runways (each almost 2 miles long) was completed ahead of schedule and other runways are nearing completion.

Bad weather halted operations during the fall of 1959 and has necessitated a postponement of the scheduled opening date from early 1961 until the summer of that year. Dulles International and Washington National Airports—both operated by FAA—are the only major civil airports owned by the Federal Government.

In concluding this summary of FAA accomplishments, it should be mentioned that FAA is making an important contribution in the field of foreign relations. Representatives of the Agency have been invited by the appropriate authorities of numerous free world nations to advise them on various matters relating to civil aviation. In addition, representatives of many foreign countries have come to the United States for the purpose of studying FAA facilities and programs. Further, the Agency is very active in several international aviation organizations.

As a result of these contacts, U.S. civil aviation policies, techniques, and equipment have become almost standard throughout the non-Communist world. In the process much good will has been generated, thereby strengthening our ties with other peoples.

LET US SAVE THE AMERICAN GLASS INDUSTRY

Mr. BYRD of West Virginia. Mr. President, the American glassmaking industry is extremely significant in the economy of this Nation. Foreign glass imports into this country have created hardships in this normally healthy industry.

One of the solutions to this problem is a higher tariff rate on imports of foreign glass. Yesterday morning, August 17, I urged the U.S. Tariff Commission to increase the tariff in the attempt to alter this unfair situation in which the American glass industry finds itself.

I ask unanimous consent that my statement be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

LET'S SAVE THE AMERICAN GLASS INDUSTRY

Mr. Chairman, for some months West Virginia has received marked attention from magazines and newspapers because of its serious unemployment problem. This, however, is not a current phenomenon; it has plagued West Virginia for at least a decade. Despite encouraging declines in unemployment in other areas, unemployment remains high in West Virginia. Most of our unemployment is the result of the continuing decline in coal, glassmaking and the pottery industry.

Naturally my attention will be focused on the glassmaking industry.

At present the outlook for the glass industry is gloomy. The communities of Charleston and Huntington, where some of the largest glass plants in the Nation are located, have for some time remained on the Nation's list of areas of critical unemployment. Even though the recession is over, the unemployment rate remains at 13 percent in Huntington and 8.7 percent in Charleston compared with 5.4 percent nationally. Other glass-producing areas are correspondingly affected.

This is significant because West Virginia's glass industry—both flat glass and glassware—ranks second in the Nation. At Charleston is located the world's largest plate glass factory. In such localities as Charleston and Huntington the unemployed glassworkers are a significant factor in the economy of the area.

In the Morgantown area, alone, three glass-manufacturing plants have closed down in the last decade. In 1959 the mayor of Huntington stated that three glass-manufacturing plants had closed their doors in the last 9 years. During the early 1950's a thousand workers were employed in Morgantown's glass factories; in 1959 employment was only about 600. Many of those now employed work only 2 or 3 days a week.

Such is the story of virtually all centers of glassmaking in West Virginia—it doesn't seem to matter whether it is the handmade glass or flat glass.

In human terms this situation means the uprooting of many homes unless steps are taken to alleviate matters. Uprooted homes and unemployment are serious because most of the workers in the glass industry are in the 40-to-60-year-age brackets. After 20 or 30 years' experience in one industry the transition to another is a real hardship on the individual. No man of middle age wants to begin again in a new industry perhaps in another community.

What has been the cause of the decline? I am well aware that more than one factor has contributed to the industry's trouble. Sincerely, however, I believe that to one factor more than any other can be attributed the industry's downfall.

In my opinion, the greatest single element in the decline of West Virginia's glass industry is the competition of imports. A glance at recent history will show this to be a fact.

During the years 1945 and 1950 when imports of glass products were not substantial, our domestic industry flourished.

Between 1950 and 1959 imports of all glass products into the United States increased from $14.357 million to $89.5 million, or to 6.2 times its 1950 level in one short decade. The growth in imports was less spectacular in 1950–54, the 1954 imports being about double those of 1950. However, between 1954 and 1959 the value of glass imports more than tripled. In value, glass imports increased 56.8 percent between 1958 and 1959. Given this tremendous rate of growth it is not surprising to find that imports of glass have risen at a rate 3⅔ times as fast as the increase of total imports.

Exports of glass have not grown so rapidly. They have increased only 1.8 times compared with a rate of growth of all exports of 1.7 times. This can be most graphically shown by the following: In 1950 imports of glass equaled 30 percent of exports; by 1959 imports were 6 percent above exports in value, showing, for the first time an unfavorable balance in trade.

Even more startling examples can be cited if individual classifications of glass are listed. In the same decade, imports of flat glass have increased ninefold; those of plain sheet glass—the largest group within flat glass and representing 37 percent of total glass imports—were 17.3 times as large in 1959 as in 1950.

Naturally, the impact of such a flood of imports affects domestic industry. Flat glass, which has been hardest hit by foreign competition, has experienced increasing inroads by imports. In 1958, 15.2 percent, by value, of flat glass consumption was imported; the following year witnessed another 2 percent rise—to 17.2 percent. I believe now as I thought earlier when I stated:

"When we realize the share of the domestic market that such imports (of glass) command, on the one hand, and the deteriorated conditions in our domestic glass industry, on the other, it is quite evident that the inroads which foreign glass imports have made in this country are not due to an additional demand for foreign glass, over and above a fully satisfied demand for domestic glass. Here there is no question of supplementary supply, the problem is one of displacement, sheer and simple, of domestic glass by foreign competition."

Why this continual rise in imports? In 1959 American flat glass workers earned an average of $3.16 an hour. Wages in our principal competing countries are not more than 25 percent of that figure.

I do not object to competition when it is fair. We go to great lengths to make competition fair within our own borders then do nothing to apply the principle when competing with producers in foreign countries.

There can be little doubt that competition with foreign glass products is unfair. It can hardly be described as fair when we are competing with plants built (or rebuilt) since World War II which pay wages considerably below (often as much as 75 percent) American wages.

Twice segments of the glass industry have petitioned the Tariff Commission for relief. In 1953, as you know, the Commission was divided evenly on the question of injury and in 1959 made no recommendation. To me these decisions are inconceivable. How can the serious—nay, catastrophic—conditions in the West Virginia glass industry be studied without a recommendation for action. Surely the tremendous surge in imports is a deterrent to domestic industry. What we need is a tariff high enough to compensate for the disparity between American and foreign wage scales.

VICTOR BORGE: A GREAT HUMANITARIAN

Mr. DODD. Mr. President, today it was my great privilege to visit with Victor Borge while he was in Washington appearing at the Carter Barron Amphitheater.

Mr. Borge is a resident of Southbury, Conn., and we in Connecticut are proud to count him as one of our citizens.

We naturally point with pride to his lofty position in the entertainment world where he is regarded as one of the most sought-after performers in show business, but perhaps with even greater pride we look upon him as one of the truly great humanitarians in this country.

We are all familiar with the demands placed upon outstanding performers in the entertainment world, but Mr. Borge has sacrificed much of his personal time to participate in fund-raising benefits for numerous organizations, regardless of race, color, or creed.

In Connecticut alone, he has given benefits for the Hartford Symphony orchestra and each year gives a concert for the Victor Borge Scholarship Fund at the University of Connecticut.

Last year, when he learned that his town of Southbury needed an ambulance, he immediately gave a benefit to raise the necessary funds.

His tireless efforts in behalf of needy groups won him a special award from the City of Hope.

And as if his regular and benefit performances were not enough to overburden Mr. Borge's schedule, he still makes it his business to find enough time to serve actively as national chairman of the CARE public service committee.

It is with great personal pride that I pay this small tribute to Victor Borge, who has brought and continues to bring happiness to millions of people throughout the world.

OBLIGATIONS OF THE NATION'S COMMUNICATIONS MEDIA

Mr. FULBRIGHT. Mr. President, we hear much these days about the obligation of those in control of the Nation's communications media. We can no longer have any doubt about the influential impact of these sources of information upon the thinking of the people of this Nation. It is gratifying that there are those in this field who have a clear understanding of their obligations. An example of this is an article I read recently which was published some weeks ago in Variety. This column, under the heading of "The Chips Are Down," by Mr. Irving Gitlin of NBC, is an indication that there are members of the industry who are attempting to fulfill a duty to the Nation's people.

I ask unanimous consent that this article be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE CHIPS ARE DOWN

(By Irving Gitlin)

Whatever happened to sputnik? Where has the sense of national concern gone? Those days when defense, education, and the future of the Nation were being widely and hysterically discussed have once again receded into the relative calm of business as usual. Since sputnik we have had U–2, the folding of the summit, Cuba, the Japanese riots (and these are only the beginning), yet we go our way as usual. I deeply believe that this country is at a juncture in history more dangerous, more critical than ever before. If this country does not address itself to the business at hand of effective national and international policy, I believe we will see in our time the end of this Nation as we know it.

This is not alarmist talk, or sloganeering. "What are you people doing?" said a respected British friend recently. "Don't you realize you are facing the end of the Western World? How can you go on as if nothing is happening?" He paused in his heated outburst, and then said quietly, "I have the utmost faith in the genius and intelligence of the American people." But he needed to add: "* * * provided they are given the facts, and are told what their historic situation is. And provided there is a mobilization of national leadership not only on a presidential level, but at every responsible level of the Republic."

What can we do—we who presume to talk to the whole Nation in an evening? What do we have to say? That all is well? That boy meets girl? That Matt Dillon is the goldurndest shootin' man ever to come out of Hollywood and Vine? Or are we going to exercise national leadership in our own areas, to give people a chance to confront the facts of life? Are we going to give them what they want, or are we going to tell them what they have to know: that we face a world in revolution, that we are in a terrible fix, that we will need new ideas, new approaches, and sacrifice if we are to make it. We who program the medium—sponsor, agency, salesman, producer, executive—bear a fearful and individual responsibility and burden, one that cannot be evaded, nor passed off by saying "That's not my job." The simple fact is that it is our job, individually and collectively, and if we don't get on with it, we can run out of a country to work in.

SENSE OF PURPOSE NEEDED

What can we do? First, come to grips personally with the crisis of our times. An ignorant person in a position of program responsibility is a national disaster. Second, apply the inventive genius, the imagination, the resources, the sense of purpose to the area of the facts. We need new ways to get the story across—new formats, new techniques for making comprehensible and relevant the central issues of our time. Third, rid ourselves of those tired old cliches that it's got to be dull to be good, that if it's public affairs it's small audience, that no sponsor will touch a controversial show, that people don't want the truth, that you can have excitement in a medium and still not offend anyone, that our job is to keep people happy. Fourth, talk about what's important. Is there a crisis in education? Let's get on to it. Is a news source withholding information? Let's say so. Have we become a society of sacred cows, of untouchables? Let's exercise our journalistic muscles and give the public a chance to see if they want it that way. Is private interest playing hob with national interest? Let's present the facts. Is there a difference of opinion on the facts, the policies, the issues, the course of action? Let's give the spokesmen a chance to have it out, and the public a chance to get at them. Are there areas of accomplishment, of positive achievement, of human victory over odds, of spirit and enterprise? Let's tell the story.

Above all, let's call a spade a spade. We no longer can afford the disorientation and disarray of the current scene. What television must do, said a friend of the medium, is undertake an adventure in realism in an age of basic idiocy.

FAIR LABOR STANDARDS AMENDMENTS OF 1960

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The hour of 11 o'clock has arrived; and at this time, under the provisions of the unanimous-consent agreement entered on yesterday, the Senate will resume the consideration of Senate bill 3758, subject to the provisions of the unanimous-consent agreement.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 3758) to amend the Fair Labor Standards Act of 1938, as amended, to provide coverage of employees of large enterprises engaged in retail trade or service and of other employers engaged in activities affecting commerce, to increase the minimum wage under the act to $1.25 an hour, and for other purposes.

Mr. KUCHEL. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from California will state it.

Mr. KUCHEL. Do I correctly understand that under the unanimous-consent agreement the amendment of the distinguished Senator from Vermont [Mr. PROUTY] is pending and 2 hours—

1 hour to each side—are available for its consideration, with the time for the two sides to be under the control, respectively, of the Senator from Vermont [Mr. PROUTY] and the Senator from Texas [Mr. JOHNSON]?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Yes; inasmuch as that amendment is in the nature of a complete substitute, it comes under the provisions of the unanimous-consent agreement, and 1 hour is available to each side.

Mr. KUCHEL. I believe this amendment, in the nature of a substitute, is a fairly important one, and if it were deemed advisable by some Senator to request the allowance of additional time during the consideration of the amendment, the only way to obtain additional time would be by unanimous consent, would it?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That is correct.

Mr. KUCHEL. Suppose a Senator offered a substitute for the amendment of the Senator from Vermont. If the substitute for that amendment were deemed to be an amendment in the nature of a substitute for the bill, would 2 hours be available for consideration of that substitute amendment?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Yes; if it were a complete and bona fide substitute.

Mr. KUCHEL. I thank the Chair.

Mr. HILL. Mr. President, I propose now to suggest the absence of a quorum, provided it is agreed that the time for the quorum call shall not be charged to the time available to either side. If such agreement is had, I would now suggest the absence of a quorum, prior to further consideration of the amendments.

Therefore, I now request that the time required for a quorum call not be charged to the time available to either side.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. HILL. Mr. President, I now suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. PROUTY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. PROUTY. Mr. President, I yield myself 30 minutes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Vermont is recognized for 30 minutes.

Mr. PROUTY. Mr. President, I modify my amendment, offered last evening, to strike out all after the enacting clause of the pending bill and substitute new language, which I now send to the desk.

The purpose of this modification is to offer a substitute for the Kennedy bill in the same terms as the amendment offered last evening. In other words, the amendment I now send to the desk is a substitute for the Kennedy bill, using the language of the amendment I offered last evening. All other language of the bill would remain unchanged.

I now send to the desk my modified amendment in the nature of a substitute; and, Mr. President, on the question of agreeing to my modified amendment, I ask for the yeas and nays.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there a sufficient second?

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. LONG of Louisiana. Mr. President, is the amendment being offered without our knowing what it is?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment of the Senator from Vermont has been modified.

Without objection, the amendment will be printed in the RECORD, without its being read.

The amendment offered by Mr. PROUTY is as follows:

Strike out everything after the enacting clause and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"That this Act may be cited as the 'Fair Labor Standards Amendments of 1960'.

"FINDINGS AND DECLARATION OF POLICY

"SEC. 2. Section 2 of the Fair Labor Standards Act of 1938, as amended, is amended by striking out the words 'engaged in commerce or in the production of goods for commerce' and inserting in lieu thereof the words 'substantially engaged in doing business as an integral part of commerce or of the production of goods for commerce.'

"SPECIAL INDUSTRY COMMITTEES FOR PUERTO RICO AND THE VIRGIN ISLANDS

"SEC. 4. Subsection (a) of section 5 of such Act is amended by inserting after the words 'production of goods for commerce' wherever they appear the following: 'or employed in any enterprise substantially engaged in doing business as an integral part of commerce or of the production of goods for commerce'.

"(b) Subsection (b) of section 6 of such Act is amended to read as follows:

"'(b) Every employer shall pay to each of his employees who in any workweek (i) is employed in an enterprise substantially engaged in doing business as an integral part of commerce or of the production of goods for commerce, as defined in section 3(t) (1), (2), or (3) or in an establishment described in section 3(t) (4) or (5), and who, except for the enactment of the Fair Labor Standards Amendments of 1960, would not be within the purview of this section, or (ii) is brought within the purview of this section by the amendments made to section 13(a) of this Act by the Fair Labor Standards Amendments of 1960, wages at rates—

"'(1) not less than $1 an hour during the first year from the effective date of such amendments; not less than $1.10 an hour during the second year from such date and thereafter;

"'(2) if such employee is employed as a seaman on an American vessel, wages at not less than the rate which will provide to the employee, for the period covered by the wage payment, wages equal to compensation at the hourly rate prescribed by paragraph (1) of this subsection for all hours during such period when he was actually on duty (not including off-duty periods within such period which are provided pursuant to the employment agreement or periods aboard ship when the employee was not on watch and was not, at the direction of a superior officer, either performing other work or standing by).'

"(c) Subsection (c) of section 6 of such Act is amended to read as follows:

"'(c) The provisions of subsections (a) and (b) of this section shall be superseded in the case of any employee in Puerto Rico or the Virgin Islands engaged in commerce or in the production of goods for commerce or employed in any enterprise substantially engaged in doing business as an integral part of commerce or of the production of goods for commerce only for so long as and insofar as such employee is covered by a wage order heretofore or hereafter issued by the Secretary pursuant to the recommendations of a special industry committee appointed pursuant to section 5: Provided, That (1) the following rates shall apply to any such employee to whom the rate or rates prescribed by subsection (a) would otherwise apply:

"'(A) The rate or rates applicable under the most recent wage order issued by the Secretary prior to the effective date of the Fair Labor Standards Amendments of 1960, increased by 15 per centum, unless such rate or rates are superseded by the rate or rates prescribed in a wage order issued by the Secretary pursuant to the recommendations of a special industry committee appointed under paragraph (D). Such rate or rates shall be effective during the one-year period beginning sixty days after the effective date of the Fair Labor Standards Amendments of 1960 or one year from the effective date of the most recent wage order applicable to such employee theretofore issued by the Secretary pursuant to the recommendations of a special industry committee appointed under section 5, whichever is later.

"'(B) During the one-year period immediately following the expiration of the one-year period during which the rate or rates provided by paragraph (A) apply, not less than the rate or rates prescribed by paragraph (A), increased by an amount equal to 5 per centum of the rate or rates applicable under the most recent wage order issued by the Secretary prior to the effective date of the Fair Labor Standards Amendments of 1960.

"'(C) Upon the expiration of the one-year period during which the rate or rates provided by paragraph (B) apply, not less than the rate or rates prescribed by paragraph (B), increased by 5 per centum of the rate or rates applicable under the most recent wage order issued by the Secretary prior to the effective date of the Fair Labor Standards Amendments of 1960.

"'(D) Any employer or group of employers employing a majority of the employees in an industry in Puerto Rico or the Virgin Islands may apply to the Secretary in writing for the appointment of a special industry committee in accordance with section 5 to recommend the minimum rate or rates to be paid such employees in lieu of the rate or rates provided by paragraph (A). Any such application shall be filed within 60 days following the enactment of the Fair Labor Standards Amendments of 1960. The Secretary shall promptly consider such application and may appoint a special industry committee only if he has reasonable cause to believe, on the basis of financial and other information contained in the application, that compliance with the rate or rates prescribed by paragraph (A) will substantially curtail employment in such industry. The Secretary's decision upon any such application shall be final.

"'(E) In the event a wage order has not been issued pursuant to the recommendation of a special industry committee, appointed pursuant to paragraph (D), prior to the effective date provided by paragraph (A), the percentage increase provided by paragraph (A) shall take effect on such effective date except with respect to the employees of an employer who filed an application under paragraph (D) and who files with the Secretary an undertaking with a surety or sureties satisfactory to the Secretary for payment to his employees of an amount sufficient to compensate such employees for the difference between the wages they actually receive and the wages to which they are entitled under this subsection. The Secretary shall be empowered to enforce such undertaking and any sums recovered by him shall be held in a special deposit account and shall be paid, on order of the Secretary, directly to the employee or employees affected. Any such sum not paid to an employee because of inability to do so within a period of three years shall be covered into the Treasury of the United States as miscellaneous receipts.

"'(2) In the case of any such employee to whom subsection (b) would otherwise apply, the Secretary shall within sixty days after the enactment of the Fair Labor Standards Amendments of 1960 appoint a special industry committee in accordance with section 5 to recommend the highest minimum wage rate or rates, in accordance with the standards prescribed by section 8, not in excess of the applicable rate provided by subsection (b), to be applicable to such employee in lieu of the rate or rates prescribed by subsection (b). The rate or rates recommended by the special industry committee shall be effective with respect to such employee upon the effective date of the wage order issued pursuant to such recommendation but not before sixty days after the effective date of the Fair Labor Standards Amendments of 1960.

"'(3) The provisions of section 8 shall be applicable to special industry committees appointed under this subsection. The appointment of a special industry committee pursuant to paragraph (D) shall be in addition to and not in lieu of any special industry committee required to be appointed pursuant to the provisions of subsection (a) of section 8, except that no special industry committee appointed for any industry pursuant to the provisions of subsection (a) of section 8 shall hold any hearing within one year after a minimum wage rate or rates for such industry shall have been recommended to the Secretary by a special industry committee appointed pursuant to paragraph (D). The minimum wage rate or rates prescribed by this subsection shall be in effect only for so long as and insofar as such minimum wage rate or rates have not been superseded by a wage order fixing a higher minimum wage rate or rates (but not in excess of the applicable rate prescribed in subsection (a) or subsection (b)) hereafter issued by the Secretary pursuant to the recommendation of a special industry committee appointed under section 5.'

"EFFECTIVE DATE

"SEC. 11. This Act shall take effect on January 1, 1961."

Mr. LONG of Louisiana. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. PROUTY. Yes.

Mr. LONG of Louisiana. Will the Senator give us some idea of what his amendment is about? Will he give us a brief explanation?

Mr. PROUTY. That is what I intend to do in the course of my remarks.

I might say to the Senator from Louisiana there is a printed copy of the amendment available to the Senator. While I have offered it in the nature of a substitute, this is the essence of what I propose to do.

Mr. KUCHEL. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a parliamentary inquiry?

Mr. PROUTY. I yield, with the understanding that I do not lose the floor.

Mr. KUCHEL. With that understanding, I desire to ask whether the Chair has ruled that the present proposal of the Senator from Vermont is in the nature of a substitute, so that 2 hours will be available for discussion.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That is the ruling of the Chair.

Mr. PROUTY. Mr. President, I am offering this amendment as a compromise. I feel it contains provisions to which those holding varying views on the minimum wage bill can repair in good conscience.

I think it is my responsibility, as one who believes that changes in the present minimum wage law are necessary, to do what I can to make certain that we are going to have a law rather than an issue. I think the American people should know, and I think the working men and women of this country should know, that merely to introduce legislation, knowing that its chances of being enacted into law are very minimal is, to say the least, being politically unrealistic.

I should like to say also that, based on the votes which were taken on amendments to the bill in the Senate yesterday, and also taking into consideration the bill which was passed in the House, unless we have some form of compromise which is reasonable and realistic, we may be very certain that we are not going to have legislation during this session of the Congress.

It is for that reason that I am offering my amendment. I offer it as a compromise. I offer it as a package because, quite frankly, there are some provisions in my amendment which I would not be able to find myself in accord with, or vote for, if they were offered as separate amendments without the other provisions which I believe should be incorporated in the bill also being included. In other words, this is a version in which I think we can bring our varying views together and produce workable, effective legislation.

Mr. President, as a member of the committee, I voted to report the bill to the Senate. I offered several amendments in the committee which were approved, and which I think strengthen the measure considerably; but I have noticed that there are certain basic weaknesses in the bill, particularly the minimum level applying to newly covered workers is such that it could create real problems.

The Secretary of Labor put his finger on one of the outstanding difficulties when he said:

> Many of the firms, including thousands of small businesses, which would be brought under the act for the first time would be required to adjust to increased wage costs of 50 percent or more.

This is a very substantial increase, and I think we must be economically realistic and take this factor into consideration.

We must take great precautions in order that any action we may take will not result in extensive curtailment of employment and economic dislocation.

It is interesting to note that in 1955, when the minimum wage was increased from 75 cents to $1, with no extension of coverage, more than 2 million workers, or 8.4 percent of all of the then covered workers, were paid less than $1, and received a wage increase.

In contrast, the bill now under consideration would both extend the coverage and increase the minimum wage. With relation to the 24 million workers now covered by the act—I think these are factors which must be taken into serious consideration—the bill would require wage increases in the first year for 2,420,000 workers, or 10.2 percent. A year later the wages of these 2,420,000 workers and of an additional 583,000 workers paid between $1.15 and $1.20 would be increased to $1.20; and so on. The economic impact of that is going to be severe.

The Department of Labor reports, submitted to the Congress in accordance with the requirements of section 4(d) of the act, show that it took over 3 years to make a reasonably complete adjustment to the increase in the minimum wage from 75 cents to $1. Even after the expiration of 3 years, the extent of concentration of workers at the $1 level was much greater than it had been when that rate was enacted, although only 8.4 percent of the covered workers had been affected. Obviously, in enacting an increase affecting over 15 percent of the workers, nearly twice the percentage affected by the 1956 increase, we must recognize we run the risk of some economic dislocation, causing unemployment.

The Department of Labor studies demonstrates that employers affected by the increased wage costs used a variety of actions to adjust to the new labor expense. This is what a Library of Congress report has to say about the matter:

> The Department studied the actions of 1,105 plants in the low-wage industries. It found that 45 percent of the plants increased expenditures for machinery and equipment; almost one out of four plants attempted to increase productivity through changes in work procedures; about one out of seven firms reported reduction in labor force.

If the committee bill is enacted as written, assuming it passes the Congress, assuming it does not receive a Presidential veto—and I think none of those assumptions can be taken for granted by any means—business concerns may put on a larger number of employees working shorter hours, to reduce costs, or get rid of workers who for one reason or another are less productive. If Congress does not make the right decision in framing a fair labor standards bill, it will find itself helping some workers in need of minimum wage protection and taking away the jobs of other large numbers of low-paid workers.

In this connection, I should like to point out—and I think this information is most important—that, according to the best information I have been able to obtain from the Department of Commerce, in the retail trade profits on sales before taxes average about 2.52 percent of sales, and in the retail trade profits after taxes amount to only 1.18 percent of sales.

I think we can see from those figures the impact which may result unless we exercise caution and economic good sense in acting on the present pending legislation.

We must recognize that the subcommittee of the Committee on Labor and Public Welfare initially extended coverage to 11 million employees. The bill was in that form when it was reported to the full committee. We all recognized that we had become completely unrealistic and unreasonable in taking such a step as that, in one fell swoop. This would have had a tremendous economic impact on the country as a whole, and would have affected the jobs of a great many workers in many industries and in many retail organizations throughout the country.

It would have had a tremendous economic impact upon the country as a whole, and it would have affected the jobs of a great many workers in many industries and many retail organizations throughout the country. For that reason we have tried to prune where realism and economic good sense seemed to justify it. Basically we think we have come up with a bill which, if amended in certain important respects, will serve a very useful purpose, will be fair and equitable to the working people of this country, and particularly to those working in concerns which are not now covered. It will enhance the standard of living to some extent and in such a manner that it will not work an unreasonable hardship upon the employer or upon the general public as a result of increased prices.

Mr. President, on some occasions a member of the press can sense the mood of the Senate on important proposed legislation sooner than many Members of this body. I think that such a development has taken place with respect to the minimum-wage bill.

The excerpts which I am about to read bring sharply into focus the fact that the Senate is now in a state of drift, and that if direction is not forthcoming there will be no wage and hour legislation enacted at the present session. I point out that that is applicable to Congress as a whole.

I quote now from a well-written article which accurately gages the present trend:

> Sentiment is growing among Democratic Senators for narrowing the scope of the minimum-wage bill.
> The Democrats appear to be turning to a compromise proposal.

I have heard all sorts of rumors relative to possible compromises. I have not seen any of the proposed amendments as yet, but I think without a compromise of some sort the country may well understand, and particularly the working people of this country may well understand and know, that no minimum wage legislation will be enacted at this session of Congress. We may have an issue, but we shall have no law. I am sure the rank and file of the working people in the United States much prefer to have a law and much prefer to have some action taken at this session of Congress than to have it simply made a campaign issue during the next several months.

Mr. President, the amendment which I have sent to the desk I hope will congeal support behind the minimum wage bill and make it possible for the Senate to act on such a bill and proceed to other pressing measures. I am submitting this amendment and I am calling it up for a vote because, as I suggested earlier, I think it is a fair, realistic, and reasonable compromise.

My amendment would not in any way affect the provisions in the bill relating to workers who are presently covered by the Fair Labor Standards Act.

I pointed out in a speech on the floor some days ago that I think those who are engaged in manufacturing industries can stand this without severe dislocation. The profit of manufacturers, roughly, after taxes, is somewhere around 7 percent, on the national level. As I pointed out a few minutes ago, the profit in the retail field, after taxes, is only about 1.8 percent. I think the manufacturers in the country, and industry generally, can stand an increase on a graduated basis, which is proposed in the bill.

I should like to point out, first, that my amendment would reduce the coverage of new workers from approximately 5 million, which is the figure used for the bill as reported by the committee, to approximately 4 million. It would do this by providing a complete exemption for hotels, motels, restaurants, and auto dealers.

I might suggest that waitresses, who receive a substantial part of their wages in the form of tips, are excluded in the bill as reported by the committee. They are not included at the present time. The others in that particular activity, such as chefs, I am sure receive wages well above the minimum wage standards called for in the bill at the present time.

Mr. CARLSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield, or does he wish to conclude his statement?

Mr. PROUTY. I am glad to yield to my distinguished colleague at this time.

Mr. CARLSON. I should like to ask the distinguished Senator from Vermont to repeat the particular groups he mentioned which are excluded. I caught some of them, but not all of them.

Mr. PROUTY. I shall be glad to do so. I shall go into that matter in more detail later.

My amendment will exempt all employees of hotels, motels, restaurants, and auto dealers. In addition to that, as the result of the change in my definition of interstate commerce, it will reduce coverage further, by approximately 150,000 people, in respect to those employed in doctors' or lawyers' offices, insurance offices, or something else at the local level, who might be construed to be engaged in interstate commerce under the concept which has been brought forth in the bill.

Mr. CARLSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield further?

Mr. PROUTY. I am glad to yield.

Mr. CARLSON. What would the Senator's proposal do with respect to retail services and retail sales?

Mr. PROUTY. The million-dollar concept which is in the bill at the present time would be retained. However, I would increase the wage the second year to $1.10 an hour.

I will say to the Senator, that goes beyond what is proposed in the present bill. I would leave the overtime provision at 45 hours. The program would terminate at that level. In other words, it would not continue with $1.15 and up to $1.25, as suggested in the bill reported by the committee.

I shall include these figures in the RECORD at the conclusion of my remarks.

Mr. CARLSON. If the Senator will yield further, I should like to make a comment. I appreciate very much the explanation the Senator has made and the proposal he has submitted. I am concerned about the ever-increasing pressure of increased costs which will further reduce farm income. After the Senator has concluded, if he will be kind enough to yield to me for 2 or 3 minutes of his time, I should like to discuss that briefly.

Mr. PROUTY. I shall be very happy to yield to the Senator.

Mr. CARLSON. I thank the Senator.

Mr. PROUTY. Mr. President, my amendment would further facilitate the adjustment of the retail and service trades to Federal regulation by an alteration of the minimum wage and overtime rates in the bill applicable to newly covered workers.

The bill approved by the committee provides initially for a dollar minimum wage rate for newly covered workers. This would require increases for roughly 20 percent of the 3 million newly covered workers in retail trade. The bill would also require successive increases in the rate to $1.05, $1.15, and $1.25 so that at the end of 4 years the wages of several hundred thousand more workers in the retail trade would have to be raised, bringing the total to well over a million. These increases in wages, affecting nearly half of all retail employees brought under the act for the first time, might well cause substantial curtailment of employment and economic dislocation.

Statutory provision for mandatory increases to take effect far into the future is a hazardous undertaking. It would be much safer to provide for only one increase in the rate, to take effect in 1 year.

Certainly, none of us knows what the economic conditions are going to be in this country 3 or 4 years from now. I think we are treading on very thin ice if we attempt to anticipate what conditions may prevail at that time. For example, we might be in the throes of a recession, yet under the provisions of the bill as reported by the committee even during a recession, if one should exist, employers would be forced to increase the wage rates of employees. We certainly know that would have most unfortunate repercussions on the economic system, both upon employers and upon employees alike. It is to get away from that particular danger that I would restrict the amendment to the 2-year period.

Statutory provision for mandatory increases to take effect, as I suggested, far in the future, is a most hazardous undertaking. It would be much safer to provide for only 1 year, as I suggested a minute ago.

An increase at that time to $1.10 an hour would constitute substantial progress toward the establishment of an adequate minimum wage level for newly covered workers.

I wish to point out—and I shall do so later—that under my proposal the workers of this country employed in the newly covered establishments will actually get more during the first 2-year period under my proposal than they would get under the bill reported by the committee. Of course, at the end of 2 years they will get considerably more under the provisions of the bill which has been reported.

But I should like to point out at this time that during this 2-year period we can consider the economic impact upon the country. We can then see how many people have lost their jobs as a result of the legislation which we intend to enact. We will have an opportunity to walk with firm steps, knowing where we are going and what the results have been, and we shall not endanger further increases, if they seem to be justified, at the end of the next 2 years.

Under the law the Secretary of Labor is required to report to the Congress the effect of minimum wages and other factors relating to wages upon the economy. We will have that information, which will enable us to reach firm and conclusive decisions.

My proposal is about half way between the position of the administration, which recommended that no increase above a dollar be made for newly covered workers, and the position of the sponsors of the bill, who desire in one legislative package to raise the minimum to $1.25. Under the proposed amendment workers would receive an increase to $1.10 sooner than they would under the committee bill. Employers would have a somewhat greater adjustment to make initially because of the increase during the second year, but overall they would face lesser adjustment problems than they would under the committee bill.

The bill approved by the committee makes no provision at all for overtime protection during the first year, and then requires overtime pay after 44 hours, a year later after 42 hours, and still another year later after 40 hours.

Overtime protection for the newly covered workers could be provided immediately. Only about one-fourth of these employees now work more than 45 hours a week, and only about 5 percent work 49 hours or more. However, these estimates overstate the impact of a workweek standard, for three reasons: First, long workweeks would tend to be reduced in any event because the minimum wage requirement would place a premium on the reduction of nonproductive hours of work. Second, in many situations these workers now receive extra compensation for overtime work under provisions of State laws and orders and collective bargaining agreements.

Thirteen States have laws or orders applicable to retail trade which provide for compensation for overtime work at a higher rate than straight-time pay. One State requires time and one-half the regular rate for hours in excess of 40; four require time and one-half the regular rate after weekly hours varying from 44 to 50; four States require 1½ times the minimum wage, and, one, 1¼ times the minimum wage.

Union contracts in retail trade are most common in the larger chains and department stores, types of enterprises in which the administration proposal would have greatest application. A BLS study shows that, of 86 agreements, covering 254,000 retail employees, all but 4, covering 7,400 employees, had overtime provisions. In 50 agreements, covering 161,500 employees, overtime was to be paid after 40 hours per week.

Third, a substantial proportion of the employees who are required to work long hours are gasoline service station attendants for whom an overtime exemption is provided.

If a basic workweek of 45 hours is established for newly covered workers, frequent changes in the maximum hours standard should be avoided. Instead, reliance should be placed on the reports prepared by the Department of Labor in accordance with section 4(d) of the act to provide a basis for determining at what time a 40-hour workweek becomes feasible.

Last, but by no means least important of the changes in the bill which my amendment would make, is the alteration of the concept designated as "activity affecting commerce."

For the past several days we have looked into the fears which have been voiced by many Senators that this broad concept of the commerce clause would be extremely unjustifiable in the field of wage and hour legislation. I would substitute for the term "engaged in an activity affecting commerce" the words "substantially engaged in doing business as an integral part of commerce or of the production of goods for commerce."

In terms of practical effect, the Labor Department advises that the introduction of the new term implementing the commerce clause would reduce coverage of the committee-reported bill by only 2 or 3 percent. I am convinced, however, that it would be a better peg on which to hang future fair labor standards legislation than the more nebulous approach designated as "activity affecting commerce."

Under that definition, if I were a bootblack shining the shoes of a traveling salesman, my activity might be construed as being interstate commerce. If I were a passenger in a bus and sneezed, and the driver was temporarily shocked and therefore became behind in his schedule, I might be considered under this interpretation as engaging in interstate commerce. Obviously, that is a ridiculous interpretation, but I think, if we go too far in this respect, we will eventually change our whole concept of government, to say nothing of the concept of the commerce clause under the Constitution.

I think I made it clear in my speech on the floor of the Senate last week that my purpose throughout my work on the minimum wage bill has been to develop a proposal which would permit absorption of the required increases in wage costs without substantial curtailment of employment or have a significant adverse impact on the economy. If Congress does not make the right decision in framing a fair labor standards bill, it will find itself helping some workers in need of minimum wage protection and taking away the jobs of other large numbers of low-paid workers.

In justification for the figure of $1.10, which I am using for the second year, I point out again the difference between the provisions for the second year contained in the bill reported by the committee and the proposal which I am offering at the present time. Under the committee bill, the wage increases to $1.05 the second year and overtime begins after 44 hours. Under my proposal, the wage rate goes to $1.10 the second year, but the overtime begins at 45 hours, and, may I point out again, it is frozen at that point.

I have utilized the figure of $1.10 as a minimum wage rate for the newly covered employees because of the great economic impact which will develop in bringing about coverage in the retail and service trades.

I point out also that there is a great difference between conducting a manufacturing operation and conducting a retail operation. A retail operation cannot be controlled the same as a production line in an industrial plant. Customers are in the store some of the time; customers are not there at other times. Clerks are standing around some of the time; they are waiting on customers on other occasions. There is no possible way in which efficiency can be stepped up appreciably in an enterprise of that character, and I think we must take that fact into consideration.

Mr. ELLENDER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. PROUTY. I yield.

Mr. ELLENDER. As the Senator may recall, a few days ago I discussed the pending measure at length, and I made the point that if the bill reported to the Senate were enacted into law, no business would be exempt except those specifically exempted under the act. Does the Senator have any comment to make on my interpretation of the act?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time of the Senator has expired.

Mr. PROUTY. I yield myself 15 additional minutes. I believe the words "affecting commerce" are so broad that eventually what the Senator has suggested is absolutely certain to happen.

Mr. ELLENDER. On the day I participated in the debate the Senator from Ohio [Mr. LAUSCHE] asked the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. KENNEDY] to point to any company or anyone doing business in a State who would be exempt. So far the Senator from Massachusetts has not presented such a list.

Mr. PROUTY. I think it would be very difficult to do so.

Mr. ELLENDER. I am glad that the Senator from Vermont is in agreement with the position taken by many of us on the floor.

Mr. PROUTY. The dollar concept in the pending bill is very unsatisfactory.

Mr. LAUSCHE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. PROUTY. I yield.

Mr. LAUSCHE. My interpretation is that under the language of the pending bill all operations in business are covered except those specifically exempted.

Mr. PROUTY. I believe that is absolutely correct.

Mr. COTTON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. PROUTY. I yield.

Mr. COTTON. Mr. President, I feel that the amendment the Senator has offered is a worthy amendment, a meritorious amendment, and that it is characteristic of the distinguished Senator from Vermont.

Mr. PROUTY. I am grateful to the Senator for those words.

Mr. COTTON. It is characteristic of him that he has offered the amendment, and I hope that the Senate will give it its thoughtful consideration. It is a sensible proposal, which I earnestly hope will be accepted by the Senate.

The Senator's substitute amendment exempts hotels, motels, restaurants, and automobile dealers. The Senator, with his customary thoughtfulness, has pointed to the situation which confronts retail merchants, and the narrow margin of profit of the retail merchants. Does the Senator rely entirely, in protecting retail merchants, on the so-called million-dollar formula of the bill, or does his amendment furnish some additional protection for the persons engaged in retail merchandising?

Mr. PROUTY. About 150,000 individuals work for small firms such as I have mentioned—perhaps the Senator was not present when I spoke earlier—in law offices, real estate offices, insurance agencies, and in employment of that nature, as well as in the hotel trade, who would be covered under the provisions of the pending bill. Otherwise I do not change the million-dollar limitation.

Mr. COTTON. The Senator from New Hampshire was present and heard that part of the Senator's remarks, although he did not catch the additional types of employment. He heard the reference to insurance agencies and law offices. Would the Senator amplify his remarks as to exactly what kind of protection would be provided for those in retail trade by the Senator's amendment?

Mr. PROUTY. In some concerns, where there are one or two individuals who are engaged in interstate commerce, normally under the pending bill they would be covered. The amendment will take care of those operations of a purely intrastate nature. Those persons may be mailing letters out of State, and theoretically they could be considered engaged in interstate commerce, particularly under the concept which we find in the pending bill. I thought I would make that change. The effect of my amendment, so far as the commerce clause is concerned, and the real impact of it, I believe will come later when the million-dollar figure at some time in the future is stricken. Then it will really have some teeth.

Mr. COTTON. I am interested in the Senator's observation that the million-dollar qualification will be eradicated in the future. The Senator knows from my previous statement that that is an inadequate and artificial provision, and a weak reed on which to lean. The Senator's substitute amendment is an excellent amendment. I regret that he does not go as far as I would go in protecting the actual retail trade, but I am impressed by his proposal.

Mr. PROUTY. I am very grateful to the distinguished Senator from New Hampshire. Coming from him particularly it makes me highly gratified. I am sure we have come up with a proposal which should be acceptable to various degrees of thought on this question. Obviously it is a compromise. We must compromise in order to get legislation through Congress. I tried to arrive at a compromise which I believe to be fair and reasonable.

The figures of the Labor Department further demonstrate that in variety stores 85.4 percent of the employees make less than $1.10 an hour, and that variety stores will have to increase their wage bills by 31.4 percent merely to meet the $1.10 standard.

Let us look at another category, the general merchandise stores. A $1.10 minimum would mean that 55 percent of the workers in these stores would get a raise, if we accept the $1.10 minimum. The employers, even at the $1.10 level, would have to adjust to a 12-percent increase because of labor costs.

We must bear in mind that the average profits for retail operations are only a little more than 1 percent, after taxes. So this would have a definite impact upon the small businessman, who will not be able to stay in business unless he increases his prices, which will have an impact on the community as a whole, or get along with fewer employees.

I point out that these increases in wage costs do not include the costs that would be involved in the overtime provisions, but only the costs involved in carrying out the minimum wage requirements.

The comments of Secretary Mitchell, who is very sympathetic to the idea of extending coverage, very sharply focused attention on the impact that would be caused by the $1.25 and 40-hour schedule for newly covered workers. I quote from the Secretary's remarks. I am not sure, but perhaps I quoted from this statement a few minutes ago. Nevertheless, it bears repetition:

Many of the firms, including thousands of small businesses, which would be brought under the act for the first time would be required to adjust to increased wage costs of 50 percent or more.

About two-fifths of these employees now work over 40 hours a week. So that the bills would require either a reduction of their workweek to 40 hours, or the payment of time and a half for the excess hours. Whatever compensation results from this payment must also be added to wage costs.

Once again, I should like to explain in unmistakable language exactly what my amendment proposes to do. I may say, again, that it is offered in good faith. I voted to report the bill from the committee. I believe the committee bill in its present form has not the ghost of a chance to get through Congress. If it passes the Senate, it will certainly run into serious difficulties in the House. If it should be approved by the House, there may be some question as to the action which will be taken by the President. So I say very definitely that I sincerely and honestly believe the present committee bill has not a ghost of a chance to be enacted at this session of Congress.

If we are trying to lead the working men and women of the country into believing that it will be enacted, we are engaging, to say the least, in political chicanery. We are not telling the facts. We are not telling the truth. From time immemorial, many politicians have tried to promise things which they themselves did not want, which they could not justify, and which they knew never would be enacted. After the proposals were rejected, the politicians would then go before their constituents and say, "I promised you this, but I could not get it through Congress"—or the State legislature, or whatever other governmental body was involved.

I believe it is my responsibility, as one who sincerely and honestly believes in minimum wage legislation at this time, to do my best to have such legislation passed by Congress this year. I hope that other Senators who agree with me and think as I do will act in the same way. I think it is a challenge and a responsibility which we must face.

Let me outline again exactly what the provisions of my amendment are. First, it eliminates from coverage the employees of retail automobile dealers. That would mean a reduction of 460,000 employees. I think there has never been any question of substandard wages being paid by retail automobile concerns. Such wages are well above the minimum wage proposed in the bill. They are well above the minimum wage now in effect, of course. So there never has been any real question about that fact.

I offered an amendment in committee which would have brought the employees of retail automobile dealers under the act, but which would have exempted them from overtime. After two or three votes, as I recall, my amendment was defeated, 8 to 7. No real criticism of the amendment was offered on either side of the table.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a clarifying question?

Mr. PROUTY. I yield.

Mr. CLARK. My understanding is that the committee bill covers employees of automobile dealers only with respect to overtime, as a practical matter. In other words, the wages of those employees are so high that the minimum wage does not affect them. Is that a correct understanding?

Mr. PROUTY. It may have that effect; but they are required, under the bill as reported, to come under the overtime provision.

Mr. CLARK. Yes; but under the Senator's amendment, the overtime requirement with respect to the employees of retail automobile dealers would be stricken out, would it not?

Mr. PROUTY. Yes; that is true. I may say that under the bill as reported the only persons who are exempt from the overtime requirement are salesmen working in retail automobile establishments.

Second, my amendment exempts the employees of hotels, motels, and restaurants. This results in a reduction of coverage of 407,000.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for another question?

Mr. PROUTY. I yield.

Mr. CLARK. If the Senator thinks I am taking too much of his time, I shall be glad to take some time from the other side.

Mr. PROUTY. No.

Mr. CLARK. Will the Senator briefly state the rationale by which he exempts employees of hotels, motels, and restaurants? Are they not among the worst paid employees in the country?

Mr. PROUTY. Under the bill as reported by the committee, as the Senator from Pennsylvania well knows, all employees who receive a substantial part of their wages from tips have been exempt.

Mr. CLARK. Yes; but the Senator knows that the most underpaid of the hotel employees are those whom the public never sees.

Mr. PROUTY. The committee had much discussion about that. I think we were all a little undecided about the attitude we should take on this particular question. We have exempt waitresses and bellboys under the committee bill. I daresay that the majority of the remaining employees are in higher paid brackets than those in either of the two categories I have just mentioned.

I believe it will be found that labor costs in hotels in relation to income are 7 to 8 percent higher than in any other field of business activity in the country. We must be realistic and take that fact into consideration.

I believe the people who would be covered under the committee bill are already relatively highly paid, certainly, in comparison with waitresses, bellboys, and others who perform such services.

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question concerning the hotel business?

Mr. PROUTY. I yield to my distinguished colleague from New York.

Mr. JAVITS. It is true that they are higher paid than tip employees, but they do not make as much of a living. The Senator agrees with that statement, does he not?

Mr. PROUTY. There are various plans for them. I certainly am not an expert in the hotel business, as the Senator from New York well knows.

Mr. JAVITS. Based on the information given us in committee and by other sources, I think we would be creating a great economic hardship. Instead of helping the employees in some of these establishments, we might be putting them out of jobs. That is one thing which has concerned me tremendously.

Mr. PROUTY. Yes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time of the Senator from Vermont has expired.

Mr. PROUTY. I yield myself another 15 minutes.

Mr. JAVITS. I would not say the minimum wage is not a problem, but I think the main problem is not so much as to wages as it is as to hours. I hope that before we finish with the consideration of the bill we will carefully consider that phase of the subject. I am an advocate of the bill, and signed the report, but one of the things which concerns me is the overtime problem as to hotel and restaurant employees, as they are being newly covered. I state that to the Senator quite frankly, because, although I do not intend to support his amendment in the nature of a substitute, I have the highest regard for the Senator's study, work, diligence, and sincerity in respect to his committee obligations. I know that his substitute is advanced with the highest motives and in a spirit of dedication toward trying to do the best possible. That is why I demonstrate my confidence by communicating to the Senator one of the aspects of the bill about which I am concerned; and there are a few parts of the bill which worry me. The question of overtime for hotel and restaurant employees may prove to be troublesome.

I think the Senator, in his discussion, has somewhat led up to the fact that there is a problem in that field, as there is. I simply wanted to make my contribution to the discussion.

Mr. PROUTY. I sincerely appreciate the Senator's contribution. As he knows, I did not offer the amendment in committee to exempt these employees.

Mr. JAVITS. That is correct.

Mr. PROUTY. I am offering my package in the hope that it will appeal to Senators having different views, in order that we may agree upon some sort of legislation.

Mr. HOLLAND. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. PROUTY. I yield to my distinguished colleague from Florida.

Mr. HOLLAND. Is it not true that only about a year ago the National Labor Relations Board, for the first time, ruled that employees of hotels fell within the jurisdiction of that Board, and that, therefore, the full bargaining procedure is available to them, although it was not available until that decision of a little while ago?

Mr. PROUTY. The Senator from Florida is absolutely correct. His statement is true.

Mr. HOLLAND. Does not the Senator from Vermont, who has made such a close study of the matter, think that that step alone places these employees—meaning employees of hotels, restaurants, and motels at all levels—in a much better position to protect themselves than they have ever been in before?

Mr. PROUTY. I think, without question, that that is undeniably true.

Mr. HOLLAND. I notice that the amendment in the nature of a substitute offered by the Senator from Vermont includes, as a substitute for the words in the original bill, "activity affecting commerce," the new words "substantially engaged in doing business as an integral part of commerce, or of the production of goods for commerce."

As the Senator from Florida reads the new, suggested words, they would completely get away from the uncertainty which is present in the words "activity affecting commerce," which are employed in the bill.

Mr. PROUTY. I may say that that has been my intention from the start. I know that many Senators have been greatly concerned about the concepts which seem to appear in the bill at present which would literally make every action of practically every individual in the country an activity in interstate commerce.

Mr. HOLLAND. Is it not true that under this general wording, which has never been applied by a court to this particular field, a number of activities with only remote and insubstantial relation to interstate commerce might be sufficient to bring businesses within the purview of the law proposed here? I refer to such activities as ordering goods to be delivered for use in the business, checking in goods which have been shipped across State lines for the business, or making a telephone call across State lines in order to procure goods or to make engagements or to negotiate contracts. Might not these and any number of other activities with insubstantial relation to interstate commerce, under decisions already on the books, but in other fields, be sufficient to bring businesses within the purview of the law as proposed here?

Mr. PROUTY. I think the Senator is absolutely correct. I think it could very easily be construed to do exactly what the Senator is suggesting.

Mr. HOLLAND. Because of that fact, is it not true that many businesses which do not have any substantial relationship to interstate commerce, would, under the present bill, necessarily remain in a state of uncertainty as to whether they were covered, until the highest court of the land had ruled upon the facts pertaining to those businesses or had ruled upon a case involving another business and facts so close to those related to their own businesses that the ruling on that case might be regarded as conclusive with respect to their own operations?

Mr. PROUTY. I think that is true. Let me add that if all the limitation amounts used, which range from $250,000 to $1 million, were in the future stricken out, then I believe almost any conceivable activity could be ruled to be in interstate commerce.

Mr. HOLLAND. Of course the Senator realizes that the ardent proponents of the bill have given notice—not only by means of bills of much wider coverage, but also by means of their statements during the debate—that they regard this bill as an entering wedge or an opening gun, and that they ardently look forward to increasing the coverage at an early date.

Mr. PROUTY. I believe that is true. However, let me say that I am essentially sympathetic to the basic bill the committee reported; but I believe that in the interest of common sense, we should take one step at a time. If in the future we observe the development of conditions which warrant raising the minimum wage, that will be the time to do so.

I point out that the last desire I would have in the world would be to sabotage this measure. I understand that my amendment contains some provisions with which my friend, the Senator from Florida, is not completely sympathetic, and that some on the other side will object to some other parts of my amendment. But I think the amendment represents a fair and a realistic approach, which is what I am interested in at the present time.

Mr. HOLLAND. Mr. President, will the Senator from Vermont yield further to me?

Mr. PROUTY. I am happy to yield.

Mr. HOLLAND. Is it not true that after long hearings, the bill which was reported by the subcommittee to the full Committee on Labor and Public Welfare would have covered approximately 11 million new employees?

Mr. PROUTY. That is correct. The full committee, being realistic and understanding of the problems, reduced the number to approximately 5 million. My amendment will reduce the number further, to the vicinity of 4 million.

Mr. HOLLAND. Mr. President, although I cannot completely agree with the philosophy of the Senator from Vermont—because mine would go further in the direction of correction of the present bill—I wish to commend him upon his recognition of the fact that there are very troublesome and troublemaking provisions in the present bill, which he proposes to correct. I commend him for that; and I certainly shall support his amendment.

Mr. PROUTY. I am very grateful to the Senator from Florida.

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, will the Senator from Vermont yield to me?

Mr. PROUTY. I yield.

Mr. JAVITS. I wish to comment on the statement about unionization which the Senator from Florida made. If we are going to make that argument, there is all the more reason for including under the coverage other employees who today do not come under the interstate-commerce definition, because they are the least organized. The unions are some of the most ardent exponents of the minimum wage idea, because it provides a floor at a certain point for bargaining and for competition for jobs.

As to the question of going far beyond this proposal and attempting to include provisions which may be hoped for by some, let me say we always hear that argument from those who are opposed to a bill; I am sure that I, myself, have made it when I have been opposed.

But I feel that the action proposed to be taken now, as typified by the activities of the distinguished Senator from Vermont and by those of the Senator from Florida, indicates clearly, in my opinion, that we shall not run wild in any direction so long as we remain the body of responsibility that I believe we are.

Mr. PROUTY. Mr. President, some time ago I promised to yield to the distinguished Senator from Kansas. I understand that I have only 6½ minutes remaining.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, I shall be happy to yield to the Senator from Kansas 5 minutes from the time available to the opponents of the amendment. So I shall be happy to have the Senator from Vermont complete his remarks first.

Mr. PROUTY. I thank the Senator from Pennsylvania.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. Mr. President, will the Senator from Vermont yield?

Mr. PROUTY. I yield.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. As I listened to the explanation of the amendment, last night, and to the debate this morning, I am convinced that the Senator from Vermont has offered the best amendment which has been proposed thus far to the Senate. I certainly shall support his amendment, and I hope other Senators will do likewise.

Mr. PROUTY. I thank the Senator very much.

Mr. GOLDWATER. Mr. President, will the Senator from Vermont yield to me?

Mr. PROUTY. I yield.

Mr. GOLDWATER. I wish to comment on the efforts of the Senator from Vermont to change what I believe to be one of the most dangerous parts of the bill.

I should like to point out why I think such a change is vitally needed. I understand that the pending amendment in the nature of a substitute would substitute for "activity affecting commerce" the words "substantially engaged in doing business as an integral part of commerce or of the production of goods for commerce."

Is that correct?

Mr. PROUTY. That is correct.

Mr. GOLDWATER. I do not have before me a citation to which I wish to refer, although I am now attempting to get it. But in the case of Martino versus Michigan Window Cleaning Co., the Supreme Court construed the terms of the Fair Labor Standards Act in that case as bringing the Michigan Window Cleaning Co. under the purview of the act. Immediately after that, the act was amended—in 1949—by changing from the use of the words "necessary to" to the use of the words "closely related or directly essential to production." That language would exclude the window cleaning company, which in my opinion is very clearly a local, intrastate business.

However, if we adopt the bill's definition of "activity affecting commerce," it is my distinct impression that we would then return to coverage by this act purely local concerns, such as a window-cleaning company which has no connection with interstate commerce, because of the very, very broad definitions of section 3(s), which provides that "activity affecting commerce" includes any activity, business, or industry in commerce or necessary to commerce or to the production of goods for, or the distribution of goods in, commerce.

One might say that it is necessary to have clean windows in order to make it possible for the employees to read the books of a company which does interstate business, and that therefore interstate commerce is involved in the operations of the window-cleaning company; or that an office must be free of insects in order that its employees, who do some interstate business, may conveniently work there, and that therefore the insect-exterminating company is engaged in interstate commerce.

So I am happy to have the amendment of the Senator from Vermont submitted, because I am sure there is no possibility that the House of Representatives will consider the bill as reported by the committee.

Mr. PROUTY. I, too, am sure that the House will not consider the bill in its present form; and as an advocate of the minimum wage, I want the bill to be in such form that it will be approved by the House and also by the President.

Let me point out that during the first year of the operation of my amendment, it will result in having the newly covered employees receive more pay per week than they would receive as a result of enactment of the bill reported by the committee, for my amendment goes to $1.10 an hour the second year, with overtime after 45 hours, whereas the committee bill goes to $1.05 an hour, with overtime after 44 hours. That fact in itself shows that I am sincere, and that any others who support my amendment are likewise sincere, and that we are not trying to sabotage the bill. We are merely trying to be realistic. We believe Congress should take time to examine the situation as it develops during the next 2 years. If at that time a further increase is found to be desirable and justified, certainly I would be one of the first to advocate making the increase.

Mr. GOLDWATER. Mr. President, will the Senator from Vermont yield for a question?

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, let me inquire whether the Senator from Vermont would like to have additional time made available to him.

Mr. PROUTY. Yes—perhaps 5 minutes, if I may.

Mr. CLARK. Very well; I yield to the Senator from Vermont 5 minutes from the time under my control.

Mr. PROUTY. Mr. President, I am very grateful to the Senator from Pennsylvania.

Mr. GOLDWATER. Mr. President, I should like to ask about a point which is a little hazy in my mind. The Senator's amendment does not in any way affect already covered workers or prevent the already covered workers from getting $1.25, does it?

Mr. PROUTY. No. I do not change the bill as reported from the committee in any way with respect to covered workers. They will get the $1.25 an hour on a graduated basis, the same as is provided for in the committee reported bill. I am glad the Senator from Arizona called that to my attention, because I wanted to make it very clear.

Mr. President, unless some other Senators wish to have me yield to them——

Mr. CARLSON. Mr. President.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, I will be glad to yield 5 minutes to the Senator from Kansas from the opponents' time. I assume the Senator from Vermont will stay in the Chamber, because I would like to ask him some questions a little later.

I yield 5 minutes to the Senator from Kansas from the time of the opponents to the amendment.

Mr. CARLSON. Mr. President, I appreciate very much the courtesy and generosity on the part of the distinguished Senator from Pennsylvania, as he no doubt knows that I will support the amendment offered by the Senator from Vermont, but I appreciate his courtesy in yielding me time from the opposition.

I have not participated in the debate prior to this time. I have followed, with great interest, wage and hours legislation and related problems as they affect the national economy. There is not any doubt in my mind that the steadily rising production costs are the real troublemakers in the farm income picture. Farm costs are also increased when the minimum wage is raised.

I have a telegram in my hand from Homer L. Brinkley, executive vice president of the National Council of Farmer Cooperatives. I shall read it for the RECORD and make some comments on it:

Re S. 3758—

That is the pending bill, not the amendment proposed by the Senator from Vermont—minimum wage bill will inflict on every rural community through direct regulation or competitive effect, added costs to farmers for production supplies, added deducts from prices for marketing services and increased farm wages. Retail and service establishments pass costs along to stay in business, but farmer is residual receiver of income after suppliers and handlers of produce take their cut. Increase in annual farm costs over 1949 amounts to two-thirds of annual net farm income 1959. No farm program in sight can make up this increasing deficiency in farm income. Seventy-five percent of farmers economic troubles are increased costs of supplies and services. Size of retail business is no consequence but effects are same whether big or little, if it operates in buying from and selling to and servicing farmers. This goes for proposed area of production amendment also—

Which is also included in the bill.

National Council of Farmer Cooperatives urges you in behalf of farmer members to support amendment striking retail sales and services, or defeat the bill.

HOMER L. BRINKLEY,
Executive Vice President, National Council of Farmer Cooperatives.

Mr. President, I wish to discuss that telegram briefly, because those of us who come from rural areas realize, as I stated in the beginning of my statement, that it is the steadily rising production costs that are the real troublemakers in the farm income picture.

An important element in increased production expenses is the higher labor costs that go into almost everything the farmer buys.

Those who are familiar with the subject realize that, despite the ups and downs, gross income from farming has remained relatively high. We cannot complain too much about gross farm income. However, climbing production costs have been squeezing net income.

Total gross income has gone up to two and a half billion dollars since 1947, but production expenses—and they must be deducted from income in order to arrive at net income—in that same period have increased $8.9 billion, and the realized net farm income from farming has gone down more than $6 billion.

The reason for that, of course, is these great increases in farm expenses. For example, the biggest increase in farm expense has been in the charge for depreciation of equipment. This is a result of a shift to greater mechanization in agriculture as well as the increased prices of farm machinery; and that it where this particular bill affects agriculture—the increased cost of manufacturer's equipment and machinery which are so important to agriculture today.

By the same token, it is interesting to note that farm labor expense does not show much of an increase over 1947—in other words, because of mechanization, the cost of labor is not much more today than it was in 1947—although at the same time farm wage rates have gone up 45 percent. The reason for this is, of course, mechanization.

Another important element in increased production expenses is the higher labor costs that go into almost everything the farmer buys. As an ultimate consumer of machinery, fertilizer, hardware, and so forth, the farmer helps to pay these increases.

Farm costs are also increased when the minimum wage is raised. An increase in the legal minimum will naturally result in an across-the-board increase.

In 1958, the per capita farm income was $1,066, while the per capita nonfarm income was $2,066; $298 of the farmer's $1,066 was for work done off the farm—in other words, earnings received outside the farm.

During that year, 1958, the hourly income for farm labor and management was 97 cents, while workers in manufacturing industries received $2.13 an hour.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time of the Senator from Kansas has expired.

Mr. CARLSON. May I have 1 or 2 more minutes?

Mr. CLARK. I yield 2 more minutes to the Senator from Kansas.

Mr. CARLSON. These figures are for all farmers. The question was asked about the bigger, more efficient farms.

During 1956, farm families operating the Nation's 2,213,000 commercial farms received an average income of $5,415, while all nonfarm families—including those living on skid row and public relief—received an average income of $6,900.

Mr. President, I have voted for many amendments to this present bill. I expect to vote for the amendment of the Senator from Vermont. I think it is an improvement. I am not opposed to some increase in the minimum wage. I am not opposed to some increase in coverage. But when that is done I think it should be realized that additional burdens will be placed on agriculture, which at this time is in very serious condition. When and if Congress approves increases in present wage and hour legislation we should do it with the knowledge that additional burdens will be placed on the farmers of this Nation

I thank the Senator from Pennsylvania.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, I yield myself such time, in opposition to the amendment, as I may require.

I wonder if one of the pages will notify the Senator from Vermont, who has temporarily left the floor, that I would be grateful if he would return to the Chamber at his convenience.

Mr. President, on behalf of the majority of the Senate Committee on Labor and Public Welfare I should like to state briefly the reasons why the committee opposes the pending amendment.

I wish to say at the outset that, having observed the conduct of the Senator from Vermont during the committee hearings and on the floor, I appreciate that he has been a most valuable, conscientious and earnest member of the committee. I know the Senator offers the amendment in good faith. I regret that it is necessary to oppose the amendment because in the judgment of myself and my Democratic colleagues on the committee it is unsound. Nevertheless, I wish to compliment the Senator for his industry, as well as for his very deep and real interest in the general subject.

Mr. PROUTY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. CLARK. I am happy to yield.

Mr. PROUTY. I wish to express my sincere appreciation to my distinguished friend from Pennsylvania for his flattering comments.

Mr. CLARK. I thank the Senator. I wonder if he would be willing to answer a few questions about his amendment, which I think would bring out the points I have in mind more quickly than if I simply addressed myself to them.

Mr. PROUTY. I should be happy to try to do so.

Mr. CLARK. Am I correct in my understanding that the amendment in the nature of a substitute offered by the Senator from Vermont uses as its format the committee bill, and then makes some deletions and additions to the text of the committee bill?

Mr. PROUTY. That is correct.

Mr. CLARK. Am I correct in my understanding that there is not available to Senators generally the text of the Senator's amendment? I was advised by the clerk that there was only one copy available. He loaned it to me, so that I could have an opportunity to study it.

Mr. PROUTY. I have defined every change made in the amendment offered last night. Every change which would be made in the substitute was part of the amendment which was offered last night. It is a matter of record, and it is available to any Senator.

Mr. CLARK. In other words, the Senator's proposed substitute amendment has been printed in the RECORD?

Mr. PROUTY. Not the substitute, but the original amendment. The substance of the substitute is identical with the amendment which I offered last night and which was printed.

Mr. CLARK. I assure the Senator I do not intend to be technical, but it is a fact, is it not, that the amendment which is presently pending is not now and has not been available to other Senators for study?

Mr. PROUTY. The substance of the amendment is available. All of the changes which I have made in the committee bill have been made available to any and all Senators.

Mr. CLARK. But there are no copies of the amendment available for distribution at this time?

Mr. PROUTY. The Senators will understand that the amendment which I offered last night is available. There is no difference between that amendment and the amendment which the Senator is holding in his hand, except that one was offered as an amendment, and the other in the form of a substitute.

Mr. CLARK. I will ask the Senator if he will follow with me the text of his amendment. Does the Senator have a copy?

Mr. PROUTY. I do not think I have one.

Mr. CLARK. If the Senator does not have a copy, the one I have is the only copy in existence on the floor of this Chamber. I will come over to the Senator, so that we can look at it together.

Mr. PROUTY. The amendment which I offered last night, which is incorporated in the substitute amendment, is included verbatim in Calendar No. 1817. It was printed and is on the desks of all Senators at the present time. There is no change in the substitute other than the changes recommended in the amendment which was offered last night.

Mr. CLARK. I hope the Senator will understand that I am not attempting to be unduly critical. I understand the difficulties of time in this connection. My comments with respect to the bill at this point are largely legal ones. I am going to ask the Senator to help me to interpret what he has in mind.

Mr. PROUTY. I am not a lawyer, but I shall do my best.

Mr. CLARK. The Senator's best is very good indeed, as I know.

If the Senator will look at page 2 of the amendment, I suggest that he follow me, since we have the only copy available in the Chamber.

I ask the Senator whether the first major change in the amendment which he proposes as a substitute is to strike out from the committee bill the words "engaged in activities affecting commerce" and to substitute therefor the words "substantially engaged in doing business as an integral part of commerce or of the production of goods for commerce."

Mr. PROUTY. That is correct.

Mr. CLARK. That latter term is defined at the bottom of page 3 of the Senator's substitute, at line 25, subsection (s), running over to the top of the following page.

Mr. PROUTY. I have it here on the copy of the amendment which I offered last night.

Mr. CLARK. Would the Senator be willing to tell me whether he agrees that those substituted words are brandnew so far as any Federal labor legislation is concerned?

Mr. PROUTY. I cannot qualify as an expert in that field. I assume what the Senator is saying is true. Likewise, I believe the term "affecting commerce" is probably equally new.

Mr. CLARK. If the Senator will bear with me, I think the committee words are words of art which were first inserted in Federal legislation in the Wagner Labor Relations Act of 1935, and which have been interpreted many times by the courts of the country, including the Supreme Court of the United States. Their meaning has been pretty well judicially established.

The point I am raising with my friend is that his new words will be subject to a great deal of uncertainty, judicial delay, and interpretation. This is a somewhat loaded question, but I suggest that nobody will know what the words mean.

Mr. PROUTY. I think that as long as we keep the million dollar figure, or the figures ranging from $250,000 to $1 million, no problem in that respect will be created.

Mr. CLARK. If my friend feels that way, then I shall ask him to explain to me as simply as he can the difference between the language in the committee bill and the language which he proposes to substitute in his amendment.

Mr. PROUTY. The only change which I think would be made at the present time is in regard to some of the smaller retail trades, which are covered under section 14. Two or three percent of those individual concerns would be involved, and certainly they are not actively engaged in interstate commerce. It might make some slight change in that regard. It would be 2 or 3 percent, and it would be anybody's guess.

Mr. CLARK. I understand the Senator is quite naturally interested in the pragmatic and practical effect of his amendment. I am afraid I must press at least briefly the legal point that no Senator could possibly tell how those words would be interpreted by the courts and what the difference of coverage would be between the committee bill and the coverage provided by these words in the Senator's amendment, these words being unused, untried, and unknown words in this field of law.

Mr. PROUTY. Of course, since I am not a lawyer myself I am not as concerned with legal verbiage as are some of my astute friends in the legal profession. As a matter of fact, I recall that when I was a member of the Vermont Legislature, every 10 years, I believe, a commission was appointed to revise the statutes. When that matter was up for action in the house, though in the past it had always been a commission consisting of five lawyers, I was able to get an amendment which required that one member of the commission should not be a lawyer but should be someone well versed in the use of the English language. That passed the house. Finally it got into the senate, where the lawyers predominated, of course, and it was stricken out.

I think lawyers sometimes engage in too much hairsplitting. I as a layman like to see language in a bill which to me makes sense, which I can understand as a layman. I frequently think lawyers will try to twist and to distort, to arrive at meanings which are not in the words. That is part of the profession, I suppose.

So far as I am concerned, the only individual or concern which might be affected would be a purely local chain which buys goods within a State. Certainly those are so relatively few in number as to be unimportant.

Mr. CLARK. I thank the Senator for his lucid explanation.

Mr. PROUTY. I thank the Senator.

Mr. CLARK. I do not wish to press the Senator or to argue with him on this point, but I should like to have the RECORD show my own strong view that nobody knows now and nobody can know for years, until the courts have interpreted the phraseology, what the words "substantially engaged in doing business as an integral part of commerce or of the production of goods for commerce" mean, and that the definition of that phrase which appears later on in the Senator's amendment is equally incomprehensible.

I say this frankly, I do not understand it as a lawyer. I do not understand it as a layman. I do not think anybody else understands it. This is one of the principal reasons why in my judgment, and I think in the judgment of my colleagues on the committee, this is an amendment which should be defeated.

I shall be happy to yield, if my friend cares to make any comment.

Mr. PROUTY. I merely wish to say that the language was understood by the Wage and Hour Administrator, who estimated that somewhere in the vicinity of 2 or 3 percent of the employees would be affected.

Mr. CLARK. Would the Senator be willing to advise us, since he is not a lawyer himself, who submitted the language of the amendment to him? I shall not press the question, if the Senator does not care to have me do so.

Mr. PROUTY. We obtained the language, I believe, from the Department of Labor, after requesting representatives to give us language along that particular line.

Mr. CLARK. Presumably it was someone in the Department of Labor with legal training who prepared this language.

Mr. PROUTY. I assume that is the case.

Mr. CLARK. I am perfectly willing to take my friend's word, but I must say the language is inartistic, in my view.

Mr. PROUTY. I have no pride of authorship, so I am not qualified to have an opinion on that subject. But I know that the distinguished Senator from Florida [Mr. HOLLAND], who is certainly one of the most able lawyers in the Senate, seemed to understand the meaning of the amendment quite clearly. Others of equal capacity have had no difficulty in recognizing its meaning.

Mr. CLARK. This may be a subject upon which we shall have to agree to disagree.

If my friend will turn to page 4, of his amendment, I note that lines 4 to 6 have been stricken out. I wonder if there is any significance legally or in coverage in those words having been stricken?

Mr. PROUTY. We have substituted other language to make it easier reading:

Enterprises substantially engaged in—

And so forth.

Mr. CLARK. In other words, what my friend has done is on page 3 to strike from line 25 through line 6 on page 4, and to substitute therefor a new definition of "substantially engaged in doing business as an integral part of Commerce," with a $1 million limit thereon.

Mr. PROUTY. That is correct. All the Senator from Pennsylvania needs to do is to take the original amendment, which I believe was printed last night and which was on the desks of Senators this morning, and read it through. He will then have the substance of the amendment. There is absolutely no change or difference between those two.

Mr. CLARK. What I am trying to do is to compare the substitute of the Senator from Vermont with the committee bill, so I can see what changes it would make in the committee bill.

If my friend will indulge me a little further, I assure him I shall not weary him by continuing this colloquy indefinitely. I ask him to look at page 7 of the initial amendment and see if he agrees with me that beginning at line 19 thereof he has reduced the coverage for newly covered employees from an ultimate of $1.25, as provided for in the committee bill, to an ultimate of $1.10.

Mr. PROUTY. I think I have made that point very plain, and I also should point out at this time that under the committee bill the rate for the second year is $1.05, with overtime after 44 hours. Under my amendment the rate is $1.10, with overtime after 44 hours. In other words, under the provisions of my amendment, during the first 2-year period the wage scale will be higher than it is under the committee bill.

My reason for inserting that language, as I pointed out earlier, is that I did not want anyone to believe that I was trying to sabotage the proposed legislation. I wanted to show that I was acting in good faith. I wanted to make very plain that my only objective is to give the Congress the time to see what the impact of the proposed legislation would be on the free economy. If at the end of the 2-year period the Secretary of Labor or other experts feel that we should have another increase, certainly I shall give such recommendation my most serious consideration. I am sure the Senator knows that in the committee I was not one who tried to wreck the bill in any form whatsoever.

Mr. CLARK. The Senator is quite correct. I agree with him on that subject. Nevertheless, the net effect of the amendment of the Senator from Vermont, if agreed to, would be to freeze until further action by the Congress the minimum wage of newly covered employees at $1.10.

Mr. PROUTY. The amendment would give such employees more during the first 2 years than would the committee bill. During that period we shall have an opportunity to examine what has happened. We shall see how many people, if any, have lost their jobs, and what the general impact on the economy has been. It seems to me that approach is prudent.

Mr. CLARK. I appreciate what my friend has said. Nevertheless, the answer to my preceding question is "yes," is it not?

Mr. PROUTY. That is correct. I tried to make that very clear during my earlier remarks.

Mr. CLARK. If my friend will turn to page 13—and again we shall look at the same copy of the amendment together—am I correct that the next major change proposed by the amendment of the Senator from Vermont is to change the overtime requirements which appear in the committee bill by making them substantially less rigorous than they are stated in the committee bill? In other words, the committee bill would reduce the hours to 40 hours ultimately, after which overtime would have to be paid; whereas the amendment of the Senator from Vermont would freeze overtime at a 45-hour figure.

Mr. PROUTY. Over a 2-year period the committee bill would freeze it at 44 hours over the same 2-year period. However, again I point out that the dollar-and-cents value of my amendment means more to the working people of this country during the first 2 years than do the provisions of the committee bill. During the first 2 years the workers would receive more money if the Prouty amendment were agreed to than they would from the committee bill.

Mr. CLARK. Nevertheless I am correct in stating, am I not, that the Senator's amendment would never permit overtime to be paid until an employee had worked 45 hours, whereas the committee bill would require overtime to be paid after 40 hours ultimately.

Mr. PROUTY. Perhaps at the end of 2 years it will be clearly evident that we can reduce the period to 40 hours. If that should turn out to be the case, the junior Senator from Vermont will be one of the first to make the suggestion.

Mr. CLARK. Nevertheless, what I said is correct, is it not?

Mr. PROUTY. Yes; the Senator is correct.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. Mr. President, will the Senator make his point clear again? The difference is only 1 hour, is it not?

Mr. CLARK. No; it is 5 hours. It is 1 hour at first, but by the time the 4-year period has elapsed, it is 5 hours. In other words, the committee bill, on a sliding scale, would bring the period down to 40 hours. The amendment of the Senator from Vermont provides that the period will never go below 45 hours; that is correct, is it not?

Mr. PROUTY. There are no overtime provisions in either the bill or my amendment for the first year.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. For the newly covered employees.

Mr. PROUTY. Yes; we are talking only about the newly covered employees.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. The provision that those who are presently covered by the wage and hour legislation get time and a half after 40 hours is not changed.

Mr. PROUTY. That is correct. I make no change with respect to presently covered employees in my amendment.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. As to new employees the difference is that the committee bill would give time and a half after 44 hours during the first 2 years. The Prouty amendment would give time and a half to the newly covered employees after 45 hours.

Mr. PROUTY. That is correct.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. That 1 hour of additional time should be contrasted, I suppose, with the difference in the wages paid.

Mr. CLARK. I would like to point out——

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. The Senator from Vermont had yielded to me.

Mr. CLARK. I have the floor.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. I thought the Senator from Vermont had yielded to me to state a proposal.

Mr. CLARK. I have the floor. I am happy to yield to my friend from South Dakota on my time.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. During the first 2 years what would the newly covered employees be paid?

Mr. PROUTY. Under my amendment during the first year a newly covered employee would be paid $1; the second year he would be paid $1.10, with overtime after 45 hours.

Under the committee bill he would be paid $1 the first year and $1.05 the second year, with overtime after 45 hours.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. If the employee has no overtime and he is paid $1.10 for 45 hours, will he get more money than if he works 44 hours?

Mr. PROUTY. Under any circumstances I believe an employee would receive more money the second year under my amendment than he would under the provisions of the committee bill.

Mr. CLARK. I should like to make the point to my friend from South Dakota that under the committee bill, after a staggered series of decreases in the number of hours required before overtime applies, overtime is eventually fixed above 40 hours a week. So there will then be no discrimination between newly covered employees and presently covered employees, while under the Prouty amendment the overtime is never fixed any lower than 45 hours. So there will be a permanent discrimination between newly covered employees and presently covered employees.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. What does the Senator from Pennsylvania mean by permanent? When the first wage-and-hour bill was passed, and when we changed it several times, we provided a certain amount. I believe we started at about 70 cents an hour.

Mr. HOLLAND. We started at 25 cents an hour.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. Yes; and then we made it 70 cents an hour, and later $1 an hour. I do not believe any legislation is permanent.

Mr. CLARK. I will not quibble about words. I am prepared to drop the subject now. When I say permanent, I mean until Congress passes another bill and the President signs it into law.

Mr. PROUTY. Mr. President, may I ask a question of the Senator from Pennsylvania?

Mr. CLARK. I yield to the Senator from Vermont.

Mr. PROUTY. Can the Senator give me any assurance——

Mr. CLARK. Of course not.

Mr. PROUTY. Can the Senator give me any reasonable assurance that any bill which is approved by the Senate will be at least as extensive in scope as the proposed amendment which I am offering?

Mr. CLARK. Of course not. I am only one Senator.

On page 16 of the bill, I note that the Senator from Vermont would insert new language with respect to the Virgin Islands. I had intended to ask the purpose of the language, but the change has been explained off the record, and I do not believe it is necessary to pursue the subject any further. The change was made largely in order to take care of the new definition of commerce which the Senator from Vermont has inserted.

Mr. PROUTY. That does not change the formula, I might add.

Mr. CLARK. If the Senator will look at page 17, lines 13 to 18, I note that some matter is stricken out there, which I have not had an opportunity to compare with the bill reported by the committee. Could the Senator advise me what the effect of the five-line insertion is?

Mr. PROUTY. That is to make an extension from tipped employees to a complete exemption of all restaurant, hotel, and motel employees.

Mr. CLARK. The purpose of the amendment is to exclude from all coverage restaurant, hotel, and motel employees. Is that correct?

Mr. PROUTY. That is correct. I have a news clipping in my hand which states, in effect, that the forces in support of the Senator from Massachusetts have agreed to that same proposal. I do not know whether it is identical.

Mr. CLARK. I do not know whether it is accurate. We will have to wait and see.

Mr. PROUTY. The press services have suggested it might be.

Mr. CLARK. Am I correct in assuming that the changes made on page 21, in line 14, and on page 22, at line 14, are for the sole purpose of eliminating from the coverage of the bill employees of auto dealers?

Mr. PROUTY. That is correct.

Mr. CLARK. As I read the language—and I have read it quite hurriedly—I believe that the language would also exempt employees of auto distributors, who are one step further up the line. I wonder whether the Senator intended to do that.

Mr. PROUTY. That was not the intention, certainly.

Mr. CLARK. I thank the Senator from Vermont. While I am completing my remarks, perhaps the Senator will give some thought to whether he wishes to leave the language in that form. I believe it would be unwise to exempt employees of automobile distributors.

Mr. PROUTY. If the Senator has any doubt about it, I would be happy to have it amended.

Mr. CLARK. I thank the Senator for his very candid responses to my inquiries with respect to the only copy of the amendment available on the floor of the Senate.

I wish to reiterate the objections which the committee has to the amendment. In order not to delay the Senate unduly, I ask unanimous consent that a statement outlining the reasons for opposing the Prouty amendment may appear at this point in my remarks.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

STATEMENT BY SENATOR CLARK

THE PROUTY AMENDMENT

The principal feature of the Prouty amendment is the discriminatory treatment it would accord as between presently covered and newly covered workers in respect to minimum wages and maximum hours. The amendment would provide for the same minimum wage increases for presently covered employees as are provided for under the committee-reported Kennedy bill (S. 3758), but at the same time would prescribe a substantially lower minimum wage and a substantially longer maximum workweek for newly covered employees.

The Prouty amendment makes no change in the provisions of the committee bill under which a minimum wage of $1.15 an hour is prescribed for presently covered employees during the first year after the effective date of the bill; a minimum wage of $1.20 an hour during the second year; and a minimum wage of $1.25 thereafter. The minimum wage for newly covered employees, however, would be $1 an hour during the first year after the bill's effective date and only $1.10 an hour during the second year and thereafter. Thus, presently covered employees would ultimately attain a minimum wage of $1.25 an hour, while newly covered employees would ultimately attain a minimum wage of only $1.10 an hour. No provision whatsoever is made in the Prouty amendment for terminating this unfair and unjust discrimination with respect to minimum wages as between presently covered and newly covered employees.

With respect to overtime, under the provisions of the present act, presently covered employees are entitled to overtime for hours worked in excess of 40 per week. The Prouty amendment provides for no overtime for newly covered workers during the first year after the bill's effective date. It provides for overtime for hours worked in excess of 45 per week during the second and subsequent years. Thus, presently covered employees would have the benefit of a 40-hour maximum workweek, while newly covered employees would receive no overtime until they had worked in excess of 45 hours per week. The Prouty amendment makes no provision whatsoever for terminating this unfair and unjust discrimination with respect to maximum hours.

The Prouty amendment would, in addition, reduce the coverage of the committee bill by approximately 1 million employees, including 460,000 employees of auto dealers and 407,000 employees of hotels, motels, and restaurants. These employees would be eliminated from the committee bill despite the fact that they are employed by large enterprises having an annual volume of sales of $1 million or more. It is to be noted that the committee bill itself provides only for minimum wage protection, but not overtime protection, for automobile salesmen employed by retail auto dealers, and that it does not cover waiters, waitresses and other employees of hotels and restaurants employed in occupations in which tips constitute a substantial part of the earnings.

In addition, the Prouty amendment proposes to revive as a substitute for the activity affecting commerce concept used as the basis for new coverage in the committee bill a wholly new coverage concept similar to that originally proposed by the administration, namely, the term "substantially engaged in doing business as an integral part of commerce or of the production of goods for commerce." The effect of this change has been estimated by the U.S. Department of Labor as excluding from coverage between 100,000 and 150,000 employees who would be brought under coverage by the committee bill. While the number of employees affected by this change in the basic coverage concept may not be large, enormous legal confusion could be expected to result from the use of this new and untried basis of coverage.

Broadly speaking, the new coverage in the retail distribution and service fields provided for in the committee bill is generally similar to that provided for under the Labor-Management Relations (Taft-Hartley) Act of 1947, as amended, subject, however, to limitations based on annual sales volume. These limitations are more restrictive ($1 million annual sales volume instead of $500,000 annual sales volume) than the National Labor Relations Board is presently required to observe under section 701 of the Labor Management Reporting and Disclosure (Landrum-Griffin) Act of 1959. The precise scope of this new concept as provided for under the Prouty amendment, is totally unknown, particularly since the concept employs phrases which clearly are not susceptible of precise definition.

In short, the Prouty amendment discriminates unfairly and unjustly between presently covered and newly covered employees in respect to both minimum wages and maximum hours, unjustifiably excludes approximately 1 million employees from minimum wage and maximum hours protection, and can only lead to enormous confusion and uncertainty concerning the precise scope of the act's new coverage that can be resolved only in a multiplicity of law suits and after years of litigation.

Mr. CLARK. To summarize, I believe it is not wise to exempt employees of auto dealers from overtime coverage in the bill, which, as a practical matter, is the only way it can be effected. I personally am not in favor, unless as the result of a compromise that may be worked out, of an exemption for hotel and restaurant employees.

The new definition of commerce is confusing and not understandable, and will lead to interminable court litigation. It is quite unworkable. I believe the discrimination between workers covered for the first time and workers already covered, both with respect to the minimum wage and with respect to overtime is entirely unsound. For that reason I hope the amendment will be defeated.

Mr. PROUTY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. CLARK. I yield.

Mr. PROUTY. While I think the language pertaining to automobile dealers is clear, I nevertheless would like to make it absolutely certain that there is no misunderstanding about it, and therefore would ask unanimous consent to offer an amendment to my amendment, which I will send to the desk, to strike out the word "an" and insert the words "a retail establishment"; so that the language will read: "Any employee employed by a retail establishment engaged in the business of selling automobiles or trucks."

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry. Is the Senator permitted to modify his amendment after the yeas and nays have been ordered?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. By unanimous consent the Senator may modify his amendment.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Senator may be permitted to do that.

Mr. PROUTY. I thank the Senator for his courtesy.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. CLARK. Unless other Senators desire to be heard, I yield back the balance of my time. I understand the Senator from Vermont used all his time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. All time for debate has expired.

Mr. HOLLAND. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The Chief Clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

The legislative clerk called the roll.

Mr. MANSFIELD. I announce that the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. O'MAHONEY] is absent on official business.

I also announce that the Senator from Missouri [Mr. HENNINGS] is absent because of illness.

I further announce that, if present and voting, the Senator from Missouri [Mr. HENNINGS] and the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. O'MAHONEY] would each vote "nay."

NOT VOTING—3

Hennings	Martin	O'Mahoney

So the amendment, as modified, was rejected.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, when the unanimous-consent agreement was entered into I was not present on the floor, and friends of mine preserved my rights to offer a certain amendment that was not germane. I have not sent such an amendment to the desk. I do not expect to. I merely wish to state that I shall not be availing myself of the reservation made in the unanimous-consent request.

I do have an amendment at the desk which I believe is germane, and which I may call up; but, so far as the special reservation in the unanimous-consent agreement is concerned, I shall not avail myself of it. However, I am grateful to the leadership for having preserved my rights, and I am sorry I was not present at the time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill is open to amendment.

Mr. HUMPHREY. Mr. President, is it possible, under the controlled time, for me to offer items for the RECORD?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time is controlled. An amendment must be offered.

Mr. HUMPHREY. I shall wait.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill is open to further amendment. If there be no amendment to be offered——

Mr. MONRONEY. Mr. President, I desire to call up my amendment, which I offer for myself, the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. GORE], the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. KERR], and the Senator from Idaho [Mr. CHURCH].

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment offered by the Senator from Oklahoma, for himself and other Senators, will be stated.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. It is proposed, on page 4, line 7, after the figure "(1)" to strike the words "any such enterprise which has one or more retail or service establishments" and insert the words "any such enterprise which operates retail or service establishments in two or more States".

Mr. MONRONEY. Mr. President, it was my understanding, as the unanimous-consent agreement was adopted last night, and I believe most Senators are still of that opinion, that we would have 1 hour a side on this amendment.

I feel there are other Members of the Senate who, like myself, would like to address themselves to the constitutional aspects of the formula used for retail coverage.

For that reason, I should like to know from the majority leader whether 1 hour a side on this amendment would be allowed under the unanimous-consent agreement.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, we understood it was likely that there would be two substitutes offered, the Monroney substitute and the Prouty substitute, and on those there would be 2 hours. We specifically required them to be bona fide substitutes, but it was the majority leader's feeling that the Monroney substitute, or, if it does not qualify as a substitute, amendment, should have 2 hours. I think I said that to individual Senators, if the public RECORD does not show it.

Mr. MONRONEY. The RECORD shows it.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. If it does not, I ask unanimous consent——

Mr. MONRONEY. The RECORD shows it, but the printed unanimous-consent agreement does not.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I had in mind that on the Monroney proposal, which was pretty far reaching and all-inclusive and an effective operation on this bill, there should be ample time for discussion by Senators who share his viewpoint, and Senators who are opposed to his viewpoint, and that it would take at least 2 hours. I read from page 16633 of yesterday's RECORD:

> Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. That beginning at 11 o'clock the Senate operate under controlled time, not to exceed an hour on any amendment or amendments thereto; with 2 hours on the Monroney amendment or substitute, in whichever form it may be; and 2 hours on the Prouty amendment, or substitute, in whichever form it may be offered.

I do not know in what form the unanimous-consent agreement was printed, but that was the intention of the majority leader, and I think it was the intention of the Members of the Senate when they did not object.

I ask unanimous consent that the agreement be modified to permit 2 hours on the Monroney proposal, 1 hour to be controlled by the Senator from Oklahoma, and 1 hour by the majority leader.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. MONRONEY. I thank my distinguished leader for his courtesy in helping to straighten this matter out. I hope we will find it unnecessary to consume the 2 hours.

Mr. President, this amendment is perhaps the simplest amendment that will be offered during consideration of this wage-and-hour bill. It would simply and definitely limit the coverage of service and retail enterprises to those operating in two or more States. It makes no other change in the bill. It does not affect in any way the $1.25 rate put in the bill by the committee. It does not seek to open wide areas by exemptions that may be sought by particular high pressure lobbies.

As a matter of fact, from the present coverage under the act, the bill would still add 3,800,000 new employees under the amendment which I offer. This compares with 1,400,000 new employees that are covered by the House bill and 4,900,000 under the Kennedy bill, if the Kennedy bill is accepted in its present form.

This amendment does not affect the extension of coverage provided in separate sections of the bill, namely, 150,000 employees in large laundries or dry-cleaning establishments. It would not affect the extension of the coverage to the 100,000 or more employees in local service transit companies. It would not affect the extension of the coverage to the 32,000 employees engaged in fish processing. It would not affect the Kennedy extension of the coverage to 41,000 switchboard operators or to the 100,000 seamen, or to an estimated 1 million employees in businesses now covered under the act, as to portions of their employees.

My amendment, on the other hand, would not affect in any way the specific exemptions from the coverage of the act which are written into the committee bill.

The only point on which my amendment differs from the committee bill is as to the basis upon which the Federal Government will regulate commerce in the retail field. My amendment would keep the traditional concept of the proper extent to which the Congress should regulate this area of interstate commerce at the point where it stood when the act was passed in 1938. The powers to regulate interstate commerce are provided specifically in the Constitution. We all know that, under various interpretations of the Supreme Court, some rather strained stretching of the Constitution has taken place, and that any business can be determined to affect interstate commerce although it is purely local in its character. In order to eliminate the no man's land which could be arrived at, in which we would not know what the Court might determine to affect interstate commerce, we would go to the core of the thing. If a person operates a retail or service establishment in one State, he has an exemption. If a person operates in more than one State, with $1 million or more in total volume in his entire operation, then he would be subject to the act under the interstate commerce powers of Congress.

It is as simple as this: It is a formula as to which we have had no great differences since the Wage and Hour Act was passed in 1938.

I agree with the Democratic platform, passed at Los Angeles, which said that we pledged to raise the minimum wage to $1.25 and to extend coverage to several million workers not now protected. This we would carry out in full under my amendment. We would extend the coverage to 3.8 million new workers. We would do nothing to affect the $1.25 an hour provision.

But the Democratic platform, Mr. President, did not say that we were going to rewrite the entire definition of the congressional concept of interstate commerce, to put the long arm of Federal power into every main street business in the country, regardless of whether the business served anyone beyond the confines of the community or the confines of the State. I feel it is of far greater importance to preserve the historic context of our interpretation, through the system which has been used by Congress—to stay within the interstate commerce feature—than to worry or to strain as to how many additional thousands we might cover by violating this historic context.

Mr. PROUTY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. MONRONEY. I am happy to yield to my distinguished colleague the Senator from Vermont.

Mr. PROUTY. Will the distinguished Senator tell me whether a large chain which operates exclusively within a single State, which perhaps has a business volume of $50 million or $70 million, would be covered?

Mr. MONRONEY. It would not be covered under this amendment.

Mr. PROUTY. On the other hand, if another enterprise had 2 stores, one of which was located in one State and one of which was located in a different State, doing a gross business of a million dollars, would that enterprise be covered?

Mr. MONRONEY. It would be covered.

Mr. PROUTY. I thank the Senator.

Mr. MONRONEY. This is correct. I know there would be some inequities arising from the fact that the huge store the Senator mentioned would not be covered, but I feel we must preserve the solid foundation upon which the act should rest. If we have power at all, it is a power derived from the interstate commerce clause of the Constitution. Under my definition we would leave no doubt in the minds of the courts or in the minds of millions of little businesses as to whether they are under the act. Certainly we should not leave this an area of uncertainty, where the courts may decide that a chain of barber shops affects interstate commerce, or that any business doing a volume of $1 million or more is in interstate commerce.

I feel that when we depart from the standard of whether it is a multistate operation and go to a dollar figure we are allowing the Constitution to flap in the breeze. If Congress can provide, as it is sought to do under the bill, a dollar limitation, then it can change the dollar limitation. Under the Supreme Court holdings, the Congress can say, if we lack the wisdom not to stay within the interstate boundary of our power: "Because you do $1,000,001 worth of business a year you are in interstate commerce, but if you did $999,999 worth of business a year you would not be in interstate commerce."

When we fix a dollar figure as the sole test of being in interstate commerce, I say, Mr. President, that is not a solid and sound way in which to legislate.

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. MONRONEY. I am happy to yield to my distinguished friend and colleague, the chairman of the subcommittee.

Mr. KENNEDY. I do not think we would say, "If you do $1 million worth of business you are in interstate commerce." We would say that the business is in interstate commerce in any case. In other words, even if the volume of business was $750,000, depending upon the kind of business engaged in, we feel the Supreme Court might hold that the business was engaged in interstate commerce. We have set the $1 million figure as the economic figure. In other words, we feel those doing business of over $1 million can pay the $1 and the scale up to $1.25. I simply wish to make that point to the Senator.

Mr. MONRONEY. I appreciate the comment.

Mr. KENNEDY. That is the reason why we have provided the $1 million figure. It is not because we say that artificially a million dollars means that a firm is engaged in interstate commerce and that a firm doing $999,000 worth of business is not engaged in interstate commerce. Both of the enterprises would be in interstate commerce if the courts should so hold. As the Senator knows, the National Labor Relations Board has made such holdings down to a volume of business of $50,000 in some cases.

Mr. MONRONEY. Yes.

Mr. KENNEDY. The dollar figure is only an economic reason and not a constitutional reason.

Mr. MONRONEY. I appreciate that comment. However, I believe that the extension of the coverage under the provisions I have proposed would be clear and definite. I hope the distinguished junior Senator from Massachusetts will correct me if I am in error, but I believe that retail establishments doing $1 million worth of business a year would be covered under the bill. Is that true?

Mr. KENNEDY. I am sorry; I did not hear the question.

Mr. MONRONEY. Retail establishments doing a business of $1 million a year or more would be covered under the bill?

Mr. KENNEDY. That is correct.

Mr. MONRONEY. But today they are not under the act?

Mr. KENNEDY. That is correct.

Mr. MONRONEY. Except those which sell across State lines. Then the employees of the shipping departments, or various persons actually handling goods in interstate commerce, are covered under the act. The bill would broaden the provision—with which I agree—to provide that those people should be totally covered if the business is interstate.

Mr. KENNEDY. In my judgment, these people are in interstate commerce. They have been for the last 20 years. However, we have exempted them from the coverage of the act for economic reasons, not for constitutional reasons.

Mr. MONRONEY. I see. As I understand the bill which was originally presented, which the committee considered with great seriousness, $500,000 was the economic test.

Mr. KENNEDY. That is correct.

Mr. MONRONEY. The point I am trying to make to the Members of the Senate is that there is rather a shifting sand of uncertainty as to future Congresses determining what should be the dollar figure. If it is $1 million this year, it could be $500,000 next year, according to the will of the Congress. Or, if some reactionary Congress should take over, the figure could be raised to $10 million a year. Thus, once we depart from the test of multi-State operation we have lost our foundation of granite and we are building on quicksand, a poor base on which to rest the vast powers of the Federal Government, which are being extended into brandnew areas of wage and hour coverage.

Mr. PASTORE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. MUSKIE in the chair). Does the Senator yield to the Senator from Rhode Island?

Mr. MONRONEY. I am happy to yield to the Senator.

Mr. PASTORE. Do I correctly understand the Senator to say that the exemption would affect retailers alone, and would have nothing at all to do with service establishments?

Mr. MONRONEY. It would include service establishments. The only big group of service establishments which would be affected by the amendment would be the independent hotels, operating in a single State. Those are service establishments which would be exempted. Motels also would be under that category.

Mr. PASTORE. How about a laundry?

Mr. MONRONEY. Laundries are not affected by the amendment. The laundry owners came in years ago and asked to be put in a separate category. I am not trying to intervene in the case of laundries, a business which is treated in another part of the bill. If a Senator wishes to offer an amendment on that subject, that is one thing. But under the definitions under which we have been operating, laundries are in a separate category and are not affected by this particular amendment to the bill.

Mr. PASTORE. The thing that disturbs the junior Senator from Rhode Island is this: Does that not present us with an incongruity insofar as principle is concerned. Are we to say now that unless it has a business establishment in another State, a laundry is not in fact in interstate commerce, but that if it has a laundry in another State, it is? Does that not present a rather awkward situation? I mean we state one principle and then we defeat it within the bill itself. I think if we intend to state the principle at all, we should go all the way.

Mr. MONRONEY. The defeat in the bill stems from the action of the Labor and Public Welfare Committee in granting the special category to laundries in the past, and in including them in that category. I am merely trying to keep this major portion of the bill on the foundations on which it has rested historically since 1938. In all the long years in which we have pointed with pride to the abolition of the sweat shop under the wage and hour law, I have heard no one criticize the formula. Now, in the year 1960, after 22 years of experience with the act, suddenly out of the blue comes the suggestion that we should depart from the multi-State operation principle and put the act on a dollar figure basis of coverage. The dollar figure was offered in the committee. Long discussions took place with respect to the $500,000 figure, and the committee decided on $1 million.

I submit that this is not the way we should legislate. The act has stood the test of time. Now we are confronted with a bill to raise the minimum wage, of which I approve, and to expand the coverage; but we are told that the old formula is no good. We must depart from our definition of "interstate" and put coverage under the act on a dollars-and-cents basis.

Mr. PASTORE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. MONRONEY. I yield.

Mr. PASTORE. That was precisely the argument made by the Senator from Florida [Mr. HOLLAND] which was joined in by the Senator from Ohio [Mr. LAUSCHE], with reference to the Holland amendment, which was defeated by this body.

Mr. MONRONEY. I know, but the Holland amendment exempted such stores as the A. & P., Safeway, Sears, Roebuck, and Montgomery Ward, giants in interstate commerce, which enjoy a vast economic advantage because of their interstate operations.

Mr. PASTORE. I do not wish to be critical of the Senator from Oklahoma, but I say that even if his amendment is agreed to, we shall not have decided once and for all the question of what is interstate commerce and who is in interstate commerce, unless we consider all the provisions of the law in the same way. Otherwise, as I said before, we are confronted with an incongruity in principle. Does the Senator agree to that statement?

Mr. MONRONEY. The Senator from Rhode Island has the same right to offer an amendment that I have. I grant that I have talked with the laundry lobby. I grant that there are 120 large laundries in the United States that perhaps need some kind of relief. It is not my fault that representatives of those industries came here and asked for a special category and received it at a time when they were seeking certain types of exemption.

I am not trying to interfere with any of the other parts of the bill that the committee in its wisdom has reported. I am only looking at the power on which our right to pass legislation affecting so many millions of establishments and millions of employees rests. My reason for proposing this approach is that I think it is a firm foundation that will not vary from year to year with the advertising success of an individual store. They can go into the million-dollar category one year, and come out from under it the next year. If a store sells $1 million worth of hairpins and other 5-and-10-cent goods, it may have 150 employees, but if a business sells $2 million worth of roadbuilding equipment, it may have 5 employees. The $1 million catchall is far more irregular, erratic, and subject to differences of employment problems than the simple formula, which I urge we continue to maintain.

Let us say that interstate commerce means doing business in more than one State. That is what we attempt to do in this act.

Mr. PASTORE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. MONRONEY. I hope the Senator from Rhode Island will leave me some of the time remaining. I am trying to limit the debate, and I have promised others that I would yield to them.

Mr. PASTORE. I realize that. I have followed the Senator closely in his arguments, and one consideration that disturbs the junior Senator from Rhode Island, and which makes him rather lukewarm toward the amendment of the Senator from Oklahoma, is the fact that if we should agree to his amendment without going all the way, I am afraid we would get into class legislation.

Mr. MONRONEY. I have heard strong rumors that other amendments seeking to exempt such businesses as national hotel chains, national restaurant chains, and automobile dealers will be offered by name. Those would be specific exemptions. It is true that under my amendment certain categories of local business are exempt. Most automobile dealers are not covered under my amendment. But that is not the purpose of my amendment. Individually owned hotels operating in one State are not covered. But the large hotel chains, such as Hilton, Statler, and Sheraton, are included because they engaged in multi-State operations.

Likewise the individually owned restaurant is exempt from the application of the act. If a restaurant operates in one State it is exempt. But the amendment would not exempt the national chain restaurants, because they are interstate in operation. We must have a line of demarcation, a definition, a foundation that will not be undulating and changing with each year's volume of business as shown by the figures when the books are closed on January 1.

The purpose of merchandizing and selling in the stores throughout America is to sell all the merchandise it can. That is what the store is in business for. Such merchandizing makes employment in Detroit, in New York, and in Los Angeles.

But I warn the Senate today that there are many stores which, when they reach the $1 million magic figure, under the proposed definition of "interstate commerce" will cut out their advertising. They will slow down on their merchandising in order to stay under the $1 million figure. Many businesses in that category will act on that basis. I would much rather have eligibility founded on something other than the magic volume of business that is shown on the books of a company on January 1, which bears no relationship whatsoever to the question of interstate commerce.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. MONRONEY. I yield.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. Then the proposal of the Senator from Oklahoma is to make the line of demarcation relate to the question of whether or not the business is related to commerce which goes across State lines.

Mr. MONRONEY. That is correct as to retailing and service establishments. Of course, almost all manufactured products go across State lines. This amendment, containing the interstate commerce provision, affects businesses which heretofore have been exempt by name. Those are retail and service establishments.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. To the extent that the amendment recognizes the principle of intrastate commerce as opposed to interstate commerce, it seems to me it is commendable, and a much better approach than a principle which clearly and definitely enters the field of class legislation, or is discriminatory on the basis of the type of business. For that reason I expect to support the Senator's amendment.

Mr. MONRONEY. I am very grateful to the Senator. It means much to us to have his discerning judgment on this question.

I yield to my distinguished colleague, the senior Senator from Ohio [Mr. LAUSCHE].

Mr. LAUSCHE. Mr. President, the Senator from Rhode Island made the statement that the proposal of the Senator from Oklahoma is identical with the amendment of the Senator from Florida [Mr. HOLLAND]. I regret to say that in my opinion that statement is substantially inaccurate. I argued in behalf of the principle advocated by the Senator from Florida, but I voted against his amendment because it was too restrictive in the coverage that it provided.

Under his bill the extension would have been negligible. Under the proposal of the Senator from Oklahoma it is rather substantial. I should like to reiterate the statement made by the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. CASE]. There is a relationship in the proposal of the Senator from Oklahoma to the purposes sought to be achieved. It is my understanding—and I wish the Senator would correct me if I am wrong—that the Senator's bill will apply whenever a business is operated in two or more States.

Mr. MONRONEY. That is correct, with a cutoff on de minimis, of a million dollars. It would be rather futile to force the Wage and Hour Act on a business even though operating in two or more States if it was doing under a million dollars' worth of business. There are practically no chains that would not be doing more than a million dollars' worth of business.

Mr. LAUSCHE. Will the Senator express an opinion on the correctness of this statement? The bill of the Senator from Massachusetts was written to bring every business, regardless of how big or how small it is, within the control of Congress. Then it proceeds to exempt. If a person does less than a million dollars' worth of business, he is exempt. The principle is that every business is brought within the control of Congress. Is that correct?

Mr. MONRONEY. That is correct.

Mr. LAUSCHE. The Senator has made the statement that under the bill of the Senator from Massachusetts there will be strong pressures applied by lobbying groups asking that they be exempted. Will the Senator expand on that point?

Mr. MONRONEY. I have had some pressure of that kind already exerted on me. I have informed those persons that I am interested in the right of Congress to regulate, and wish to restrict the regulation to interstate operations. My definition in the bill of two or more States brings under the wage and hour law the giant chains.

Mr. LAUSCHE. It is my understanding that hotel operators—the Statler, Hilton, Sheraton, and so forth—are asking to be exempted from the bill pending before the Senate.

Mr. MONRONEY. I have heard reports that exemption is sought not only for single-State operations in the hotel business, but also of the large, mighty hotel chains, with tens of thousands of employees.

Mr. LAUSCHE. I should like to ask the Senator from Oklahoma, if we exempt from the pending bill operations which are conducted in practically every large city in the country, how we can justify keeping anyone within the provisions of the bill?

Mr. MONRONEY. I can hardly defend an act which would place under the Wage and Hour Act a business selling earthmoving equipment, doing business in perhaps five States, and employing about five employees, and at the same time exempt tens of thousands of employees in the giant hotel chains like Statler and Hilton, or in some of the giant food chains.

I could not square it with my concept of fairness. The million-dollar figure is an arbitrary figure. Originally it was $500,000. If it was $500,000 before, it can be that figure again. Therefore we would have a very irregular base on which to decide what is to be regulated as interstate commerce.

Mr. LAUSCHE. I assume the Senator from Oklahoma agrees with me that the pending bill covers everyone.

Mr. MONRONEY. That is correct; except——

Mr. LAUSCHE. The only ones it does not cover are those who are exempted by specific provisions in the bill.

Mr. MONRONEY. Or by the dollar figures on their volume.

Mr. LAUSCHE. Is my understanding correct that the proposal of the Senator from Oklahoma at the very beginning contemplates covering those who operate within 2 or more States and do more than a million dollars' worth of business?

Mr. MONRONEY. The Senator is absolutely correct.

Mr. LAUSCHE. So that in the basic application of the bill the Senator from Oklahoma makes the exemptions without their having to be specifically granted after pressure is applied?

Mr. MONRONEY. The Senator has spoken very well and very wisely. I believe we are far better off in supporting the proposition that if exemptions are to be made they should be made on constitutional grounds, and that Congress has no business reaching the long arm of the Federal Government into purely intrastate operations, of hotel and service establishments, for instance. I would rather say that if there are to be exemptions they should be on the basis of the duty of Congress to legislate in the field of interstate commerce. I would prefer to rest our case on what has been proved sound in the past with respect to the Constitution and the policy to be followed, instead of saying, "You have so many persons in your lobby, and we have received so many wires, so we will exempt you, because you have a good pressure group." If we stay with the Constitution, we cannot go wrong. I believe that the country, particularly on the eve of an election campaign, would applaud Congress if we said that we will stay with the Constitution, that the new administration will not be in the position of stretching the Constitution. I have seen it done in the past, and I never liked it.

Mr. LAUSCHE. We would be on very precarious ground if we adopted the policy of covering all and then saying, "If you want to get out from under it, come to see us." The little fellow will not get out. The big fellow will get out. That is why the effort is made to exempt hotels. I ask why that should be. Why should we exempt hotels which are doing business in practically all the large cities of the country? That is a mystery to me.

Mr. GOLDWATER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. MONRONEY. I yield.

Mr. GOLDWATER. I express my gratitude to my friend from Oklahoma for offering what I consider to be a very important amendment, if we ever expect to get a minimum wage bill before the President for signature.

If the Senator will permit me, I should like to point out my reasons for supporting the amendment. Under the language of the Kennedy bill, the definition of the phrase "activity affecting commerce" is given as:

> "Activity affecting commerce" includes any activity, business, or industry in commerce or necessary to commerce or to the production of goods for, or the distribution of goods in, commerce.

I suggest to my friend from Oklahoma that this is quite a deviation from the definition contained in section 3(b) of the Fair Labor Standards Act, which reads:

> "Commerce" means trade, commerce, transportation, transmission, or communication among the several States or from any State to any place outside thereof.

If we recognize the very great deviation of the Kennedy language from the present language, we can understand why small businessmen and all businessmen are very apprehensive of the Kennedy bill.

We must go a step further. Under section 3(r) of the pending bill we read:

> "Enterprise" means the related activities performed (either through unified operation or common control) by any person or persons for a common business purpose, and includes all such activities whether performed in one or more establishments or by one or more corporate or other organizational units.

I shall take one example to show why the Monroney amendment is important. It makes abundantly clear, even to a layman, that a business having an establishment in two or more States is engaged in interstate commerce. Therefore, anyone can argue that, even the Supreme Court.

As I explained on the floor last night, it is common practice among smaller stores to pool together, not necessarily in a State, but in all the States, to provide, we might say, cooperative or corporate buying centers in the markets.

I maintain that under the definition of "enterprise" and the definition of "affecting commerce" a small store having a buying office in New York, doing a million dollars' worth of business, would come under the Fair Labor Standards Act, because the total operation, through unified operation or control, would bring it under the act.

One thing which the distinguished Senator's amendment will prevent, and which I think the Kennedy language will allow, is bringing back to life situations which were brought about by the case of Martino v. Michigan Window Cleaning Co., a case in which the Sixth Circuit Court of Appeals held that the window cleaning company was operating in interstate commerce because it was cleaning windows for a business which was engaged in interstate commerce. I believe the act was amended in the following year, and the language changed, so that that could not come about.

The Kennedy proposal now reopens this danger. An insecticide company which was keeping bugs out of the offices of a business operating in interstate commerce would come under the Kennedy language. The window cleaning company would come under it. Tens of thousands of small businesses which are now not considered as operating in interstate commerce would come under it.

So we have this case, among others, which establishes the attitude of the courts in interpreting loose, broad language concerning the commerce clause.

I think the amendment of the Senator from Oklahoma would very definitely tie the language down so that everyone would know that the minute he opened a store in another State, he was in interstate commerce, regardless of the Supreme Court. It would be a decision which the businessman would make for himself.

The distinguished chairman of the subcommittee has alluded to this as an economic problem which many others have. I want them to understand what kind of economics they are playing with. The departmental merchandise operating results of 1959, which are produced by the Comptroller's Congress of the National Retail Merchants Association, show department store sales under $1 million. The net gain, after Federal income taxes, for stores doing less than $250,000 business, is 1.5 percent; for stores doing business of $250,000 to $500,000, the net gain is 2.7 percent. For stores doing business between $500,000 and $1 million, it is 2.3 percent.

For specialty stores doing business of under $1 million, the only profit figure I can obtain is for those doing from $500,000 to $1 million business, and the figure is 1.3 percent.

Engaging in the retail business is not the easiest way, today, to get rich. The Senator from Oklahoma has been in that line. It is not the easy, sailboat ride that many people picture. One cannot pluck out profits which do not exist because of the costs resulting from rising wages, wages which should be raised by natural means.

I thank the Senator from Oklahoma for yielding.

Mr. MONRONEY. I thank the Senator from Arizona. He knows one of the hazards of leaving anything indefinite, whether one does or does not come under a wage act, whether he actually does a million dollars' worth of business, or whether he does $999,000 worth of business, so as to exempt him. Literally thousands of small businesses will be subject to uncertainty. Perhaps they will not count their sales in exactly the same way. Those sales records will have to be audited each year by the wage-hour people to see if some of the sales to the stockholders were included in the retail sales; or to determine what was service and what was sales.

So there is vast uncertainty as to whether one is under the act; whether he is working his employees overtime without properly compensating them for it; and whether he will be faced with claims, after a year or two, as to which he has no defense. An employee may say, 2 years from now, "You were under the act. You may not think you were. I worked every Saturday. Now I have a claim for overtime."

The employer may have no records to disprove the employee's claim that he worked on every Saturday. So the backpay and overtime requirement, to determine the total amount involved in backpay, is one of the great hazards which we face.

Mr. WILLIAMS of New Jersey. Mr. President, will the Senator from Oklahoma yield?

Mr. MONRONEY. I should like to yield the floor, to permit the opposition to make some statements.

Mr. WILLIAMS of New Jersey. As I understand the substitute amendment of the Senator from Oklahoma, there is a $1 million exclusion.

Mr. MONRONEY. There is a $1 million exclusion.

Mr. WILLIAMS of New Jersey. Will not that create some uncertainty?

Mr. MONRONEY. No. It is de minimis, depending on the number of inspectors there will be chasing around to look at chain operations which would be likely, 99 44/100ths of the time, to be over the $1 million figure.

Mr. WILLIAMS of New Jersey. But it would still be possible, under the substitute amendment of the Senator from Oklahoma, for an employer to be under the law one year and not to be under it the next year.

Mr. MONRONEY. Probably there could be a very small percentage; but we allowed the $1 million to remain on the basis of the de minimis condition. A lot of that is certain to occur where they chase all over the country to see whether they were accurate. They are in interstate commerce, and that is a big exemption. There is a very great difference. The $1 million is still the test. But the first test as to whether they are under the law is whether they are in an interstate operation; and then the $1 million provision applies.

Mr. WILLIAMS of New Jersey. So there are two tests, under the Senator's substitute amendment.

Mr. MONRONEY. The prime test is whether the business is interstate commerce. To take care of the de minimis matter, we retained the $1 million provision of the committee bill.

Mr. WILLIAMS of New Jersey. Under the National Labor Relations Act, the amount is $500,000.

Mr. MONRONEY. Yes. I do not know why that is. I know labor is interested in making it the dollar figure, because any time they are powerful enough to move the amount down to $500,000, a lot of little businesses can be included.

Mr. WILLIAMS of New Jersey. Then it would squarely conform with the National Labor Relations Act.

Mr. MONRONEY. That is correct. I think that is what they have in mind. But I would rather make it conform to the commerce clause of the Constitution. Then we would have a solid foundation on which to rest.

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. MONRONEY. I yield.

Mr. ANDERSON. Does the amendment of the Senator from Oklahoma include or exclude, in any way, automobile dealers?

Mr. MONRONEY. No, not by name; but dealers, except those who are engaged in multi-State operations, would be exempt under the bill, not by name, but because they are engaged in intrastate operations to a large degree. One or two large chains of automobile dealers would not be exempt.

Mr. ANDERSON. The amendment of the Senator from Oklahoma deals with only one class of people. Are automobile dealers in a separate category?

Mr. MONRONEY. No; they are retailers. They are in the same category with all retailers. Local hotels, if they do not operate in more than one State, would not come within the coverage provision. It could be ships and shoes or sealing wax. If stores are selling goods or rendering service in only one State, they are not within the act. That is, if it is a single-State operation, it is in intrastate commerce, and the long arm of the Federal Government will not come in to regulate it.

One other point I should like to make. The Senator from Vermont asked about a local store which does business of $1 million a year. Every State has the absolute right to enact its own wage and hour law to apply to the people in that State. The States do not have power to go into other States, but they can enact their own wage and hour provisions to catch any kind or type of business for which they choose to legislate.

Mr. ANDERSON. The reason why I asked the question was that one Senator said that since automobile dealers and laundries were in separate categories, the Senator's amendment did not touch them. Does the Senator know whether they are in separate categories?

Mr. MONRONEY. My amendment does not touch laundries, because they are in a separate category. Automobile dealers will be exempt under this provision so long as they do not operate in more than one State or have sales agencies in more than one State. So the Senator need have no fear of that. I think he is well aware of my continuing interest in the automobile field.

Mr. ANDERSON. Very well, indeed. That is one thing which prompted me to ask the question. I shall go back and check with the Senator who gave me the information that the amendment did not cover automobile dealers.

Mr. MONRONEY. The amendment covers automobile dealers and any others who operate in a retail business, unless they operate in more than one State. Some few of them will be caught, and they will not like it.

Mr. LAUSCHE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. MONRONEY. I yield.

Mr. LAUSCHE. Are automobile dealers specifically exempt under existing law?

Mr. MONRONEY. Under the exemption exempting all retailers, they are exempt. But the bill now provides that retailers who do more than $1 million a year gross business are under the interstate commerce provision, whether they operate one establishment or not. We go back to the principle that they must operate in more than one State in order to be under the act.

Mr. LAUSCHE. Is my understanding correct that automobile dealers will be included under the Kennedy bill if they do $1 million business or more annually within a State, unless, later, an exemption is made for them?

Mr. MONRONEY. That is correct; but I believe the Kennedy bill exempts from the overtime provisions salesmen who are employed on a strictly commission basis, because it is not a matter of hours or wages with them. The Kennedy bill recognizes that, and has exempted such employees.

Mr. President, I reserve the remainder of my time.

Mr. LAUSCHE. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum, and ask unanimous consent that the time required for the quorum call not be charged to the time available to either side under the agreement.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? Without objection, it is so ordered; and the clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. How much time does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to himself?

Mr. KENNEDY. I yield myself 5 minutes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Massachusetts is recognized for 5 minutes.

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, let me say that when I finish, unless some other Member of the Senate wishes to speak on this amendment, we might then yield back all time remaining to us on the amendment except 5 minutes, if the Senator from Oklahoma will do likewise, and thereafter we might proceed to vote on the amendment.

I merely wish to point out to the Senate why I oppose the amendment: The reason is that the amendment would remove 1,500,000 employees from the coverage.

The figures used by the Senator from Oklahoma indicate that his amendment would remove from the coverage approximately 1,300,000 workers or 1,250,000 workers, or perhaps 1,200,000. There is some difference of opinion on that point. But according to the information which I have, the number removed by the amendment might be as many as 1,500,000.

This bill would not bring into interstate commerce anyone who today is not in interstate commerce. Nearly all the ones who would be covered by means of our bill are now covered by the Taft-Hartley Act. As Senators know, as regards retail stores the National Labor Relations Board has set an artificial standard or figure for its own convenience—namely, I believe, $250,000, and has stated that control over those doing less than $250,000 business would be yielded to the States. But there is no question that the National Labor Relations Board could, under the Taft-Hartley Act, if the Board had the necessary manpower, cover companies of even smaller size.

So, Mr. President, when we use the $1 million standard, we are not introducing a new constitutional concept. All these businesses are in interstate commerce, and have been for many years. What we are doing by using the $1 million figure is saying that anyone who is operating a business of that size can afford to pay his employees $1 an hour and, during the second year, $1.05, and so on until in 4 years the $1.25 will be reached.

So I wish to separate the constitutional argument from the argument the Senator from Oklahoma has made very effectively. My point is that all of them are in interstate commerce.

Yet the Senate is faced with the practical problem of deciding what provisions to apply to the owners of businesses which may operate in only one State and, may do $10 million of business. Yet under the Monroney amendment, unless they owned a branch in another State, they would be exempt, and would not have to pay the minimum wages called for by this bill.

My belief is that the test provided in our bill is a good one, and that if a business does $1 million of business, it can pay its employees $1 an hour, to begin with.

So that is the question. Therefore, Mr. President, I think the amendment should be rejected.

I am prepared to accept some changes in other parts of the bill, particularly as regards hotels, restaurants, and the problems faced by the automobile dealers. If this amendment is rejected, then we could make those concessions. But if this amendment is adopted and removes from coverage the 1,500,000 employees, and if we then proceeded to exempt hotels and restaurants, and thus removed from coverage another 500,000 employees, then in my opinion the bill would suffer a grievous blow.

So I hope the pending amendment will be rejected. If it is rejected, I shall then be prepared to consider making the other adjustments.

Mr. HOLLAND. Mr. President, if the Senator from Massachusetts will yield, let me say that I noticed on the ticker a statement to the effect that the Senator from Massachusetts had agreed to the elimination of the groups which the Senator has just now stated would be removed from coverage by means of the pending amendment. Is that correct?

Mr. KENNEDY. No, I did not agree to that.

Mr. HOLLAND. I am sorry if I misunderstood.

Mr. KENNEDY. I said that in order to maintain within reason the coverage provided by the bill, as we now have provided it in the bill, if it would help to maintain that coverage, which would be 4,500,000 employees, I would be willing to make concessions as regards hotels and restaurants. However, I could not possibly agree, for obvious reasons, to accept the Monroney amendment; and I have not made any public statement about accepting it, and certainly no statement of the sort just now referred to. For obvious reasons, I could not possibly agree to accept the Monroney amendment, which would remove from coverage 1,500,000 employees, and then, in addition, agree to amendments which would remove from coverage the 500,000 employees of the hotels and restaurants.

But if the Monroney amendment is rejected, I shall be prepared to attempt to make the latter concessions.

Mr. HOLLAND. But would not most of those in the latter groups come within the exemption provisions of the Monroney amendment?

Mr. KENNEDY. Not necessarily, because there are many hotels and restaurants which would not be covered by the Monroney amendment.

Mr. HOLLAND. But any hotels or motels or the like which were involved in a chain situation and operated in two States would still be covered by the bill, would they not?

Mr. KENNEDY. If they were operating in two States, they certainly would be covered.

Mr. LAUSCHE. Mr. President, will the Senator from Massachusetts yield?

Mr. KENNEDY. I yield.

Mr. LAUSCHE. If there is in contemplation exempting the hotels, would hotel operations which have branches in practically all the large States of the Nation come within that exemption?

Mr. KENNEDY. If we exempt all hotels, then all hotels will be exempted.

Mr. LAUSCHE. In that event the Hilton hotels and the Statler hotels and the Sheraton hotels would be exempted. Does the Senator from Massachusetts think those hotels are not engaged in interstate commerce, if all the other hotels which he contemplates covering are considered to be in interstate commerce?

Mr. KENNEDY. Let me make clear that I think the bill should remain as it is. My objective is to keep under coverage as many people as we can. If I thought we had the necessary votes, I would stick to the bill, as it now stands, to the very end; that is my point.

Mr. LAUSCHE. Does that mean that in order to obtain the necessary votes, the large hotels must be excluded?

Mr. KENNEDY. Well, I shall ask a question of the Senator from Ohio: Is he in favor of the Monroney amendment?

Mr. LAUSCHE. Yes, I am.

Mr. KENNEDY. Then the Senator from Ohio and I disagree, because the Monroney amendment would eliminate from coverage 1,500,000 employees.

Mr. HOLLAND. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. KENNEDY. I yield.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time of the Senator has expired.

Mr. KENNEDY. I yield myself 5 more minutes.

Mr. HOLLAND. Is it not true that a large part, at least, of the 500,000 or less who are included in hotels, restaurants, and motel employment are included within the exemption that would be accomplished by the Monroney amendment?

Mr. KENNEDY. In my opinion, it would affect some. I could not give the Senator the figure, but it would affect a good many. A good many would not be affected.

Mr. HOLLAND. In other words, there would be a division between those affected and those not affected?

Mr. KENNEDY. Yes.

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. KENNEDY. I yield.

Mr. JAVITS. As the Senator knows, I am for the bill. I signed the majority report, and I intend to stay with the bill. If the Senator is giving consideration to accepting certain modifications, has the Senator given any consideration to this much discussed question of automobile mechanics who are treated differently in the same establishment?

Mr. KENNEDY. Yes. It seems to me we could make an agreement on overtime. We would not take them out, but I refer to the overtime.

Mr. JAVITS. I concur with the Senator in that respect. I hope we can work it out.

Mr. KENNEDY. Before this bill came out of committee a good many compromises and concessions had been made in order to win majority approval. The bill did not fare very well in the House of Representatives. This is a difficult subject. We are anxious to keep as many people as possible under the bill. It is to that end that I am attempting to make these efforts.

I trust the pending amendment will be defeated. While it has some support, if 1,500,000 are taken out from under the protection of the Minimum Wage or Fair Labor Standards Act who are in interstate commerce, I think it would be most undesirable. After all, what we are asking to be done is that these people be paid $1 in 1961; and if a business has a $1 million gross, I think it can pay $1 an hour; and we do not raise it to the maximum amount until 1964.

The Senator knows that the cost of living is gradually rising, and $1.25 an hour in 1964 for a 30-hour week is not going to be excessive.

Therefore, I hope the Senate, with due respect to my friend from Oklahoma, will reject his amendment, only because it will eliminate a great number of people from coverage of the bill.

Mr. MONRONEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. KENNEDY. I yield.

Mr. MONRONEY. I find myself in disagreement, first, on the Senator's statement on coverage. Taking the only base which I can take, the Labor Department's estimate—and I believe the committee figures, with which I have checked, also show this—the total coverage of the Kennedy bill as now written is 4,900,000 and the aggregate coverage under my amendment is a total of 3,800,000. So it does not make a difference of one and a half million; it makes a difference of 1,100,000.

If the Senator accepts the hotel exemption, which would include Hilton, Statler, and the other giant chains, he would eliminate 167,000 employees in the hotel coverage from the figure of 4,900,000. If he accepts the restaurant exemption, he will exempt 240,000 in addition. If he accepts the automobile dealers——

Mr. KENNEDY. We are keeping them under the coverage of the act.

Mr. MONRONEY. From overtime. A mechanic draws $3 an hour, and the fear of the automobile dealers is primarily about the overtime pay.

Mr. KENNEDY. We are not exempting the automobile industry from the act; so I think if the Senator will add up the figures of 240,000 and 160,000, he will reach the figure of 400,000.

Mr. MONRONEY. But the Senator cannot have it both ways, because the overtime exemption in the automobile business must be considered. I have talked to automobile dealers and asked them if they could get a wash boy at $50 a week, which is what he would get for a 40-hour week at $1.25, and they have not been able to produce one. The $3 an hour pay which the mechanic receives is what the automobile dealers are concerned with. They do not want to pay the overtime.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time of the Senator has expired.

Mr. KENNEDY. I yield myself 10 more minutes.

Mr. MONRONEY. I leave the wage the same. The Senator says we are not going to make the auto dealer pay the wage, but we have already exempted the commission man, and they number 100,000. The only thing the automobile dealers are concerned with is the wash boy, or perhaps an apprentice. So that provision is very important. There is still a gap of 249,000 there.

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. MONRONEY. I yield.

Mr. KENNEDY. We have been working on this matter for a year, and we have pretty good information from the Department of Labor, and, of course, they are the same figures used in all the amendments. We worked on the amendment of the Senator from Oklahoma. These figures are from the Department of Labor. The coverage under my amendment would be 4,900,000. If the automobile amendment is agreed to, there will be a coverage of 3,500,000, or a total loss of approximately 1,400,000.

Mr. MONRONEY. That is before the deductions for hotels and restaurants.

Mr. KENNEDY. We have not come to the hotels and restaurants.

Mr. MONRONEY. I am talking about the ultimate. So if the Senator is supporting the matter which has been proposed, we come up with a gap of 400,000; but whether it is 400,000, or 500,000, or 600,000, I say it is not worth stretching the Constitution to that point.

The distinguished Senator from Massachusetts has been very kind in permitting me to discuss this with him at such length. Originally my amendment was the same as what the House provided; namely, that there had to be five or more establishments in two or more States. At the request of the Senator, I leaned toward the Senator's theory, and I removed the provision relating to five or more, and made it simply a multi-State coverage. It affected 800,000.

My record is not one of supporting sweatshop operations and of trying to exempt people who should be covered, but I have the old-fashioned feeling that my duties as a Senator are pretty generally confined to regulating interstate operations when we reach the long arm of the Federal Government into retail business.

I think we have a clear-cut issue. The Senator has the test of volume, which many people can support. If wheat is raised in Minnesota, and shipped to Chicago for milling, and then shipped to Florida for consumption, I concede that is interstate commerce. I do not consider that the retail baker should be considered in interstate commerce.

Mr. KENNEDY. I do not think there is any question of coverage even if they operated in only one State, or the store was in one State. They have been covered by the Taft-Hartley Act. Therefore, what we are talking about is not putting an artificial test of $1 million to determine whether they are in interstate commerce. They are in interstate commerce. The test of $1 million is to determine whether they should pay the minimum wage. That is the question. I am not setting up some new definition of the interstate commerce clause of the Constitution. These people are covered, in most cases, by other acts. The Taft-Hartley Act is an obvious one.

Even if they happen to have only one store in one State, if they have a disturbance with labor, the National Labor Relations Board has jurisdiction. The fact is that the National Labor Relations Board has set a $250,000 limit. The Board will accept all cases in all companies above $250,000 in retail trades. This indicates these people are covered by interstate commerce. The question before us, therefore, is, Shall they pay $1? That is what the million-dollar test means. The million-dollar test is not intended to decide whether they are in interstate commerce. They are in interstate commerce. The million-dollar test only determines whether they are financially strong enough to pay $1.

Mr. KEFAUVER and Mr. COOPER addressed the Chair.

Mr. KENNEDY. I yield first to the Senator from Tennessee, and then I shall yield to the Senator from Kentucky.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time of the Senator from Masachusetts has expired.

Mr. KENNEDY. I yield 10 more minutes, if we have that much time remaining.

Mr. KEFAUVER. Mr. President, the distinguished Senator from Massachusetts said he was prepared to make some concessions, without saying what they were, in connection with automobile dealers and hotels. I wonder if the Senator had in mind making any concessions in connection with laundries, which are quite a problem.

Mr. KENNEDY. No.

Mr. KEFAUVER. Will the Senator explain for the record, then, the meaning of the $250,000 provision on page 18, and whether it applies to laundries? This would seem to indicate that under some circumstances laundries doing $250,000 worth of business in a metropolitan area might find themselves under the terms of the bill.

Mr. KENNEDY. This particular matter is involved, really, in a situation in the District of Columbia, where the laundry is competing with a laundry in Baltimore, I believe.

Mr. KEFAUVER. In Richmond.

Mr. KENNEDY. In Richmond; yes.

Mr. KEFAUVER. Would it not apply to any metropolitan area? I do not see how a laundry doing more than a million dollars' worth of business in the same city with a laundry doing $250,000 worth of business would not be in substantial competition.

Mr. KENNEDY. The language on lines 19, 20, 21, and 22 involves only a laundry which has lost its exemption by doing more than 50 percent of its business across State lines.

Mr. KEFAUVER. I think a great many laundry people are justifiably alarmed about this language. There ought to be some consideration given to relief for the laundries, or at least to a clarification of the language, I submit to the Senator.

Mr. KENNEDY. I think it is reasonably precise, but if the Senator has an amendment, we shall be glad to look at it.

Mr. COOPER and Mr. RANDOLPH addressed the Chair.

Mr. KENNEDY. I yield first to the Senator from Kentucky, and then I shall yield to the Senator from West Virginia.

Mr. COOPER. Mr. President, I wish to address myself to a question which I do not think has been clearly answered in the debate, at least while I have been in the Chamber.

The junior Senator from Massachusetts spoke to the point a moment ago, but I think it is necessary that we develop it for the legislative history.

I believe it has been generally assumed in this debate that a retail or service establishment would be brought under the bill if its annual gross volume of sales is a million dollars or more. I do not agree with this interpretation. I insist that the business, even if it grosses more than $1 million, must be in interstate commerce.

I should like to have the attention of the Senator from Massachusetts. I believe this question, which I address to the Senator, has not been clearly established, although the Senator spoke to it a moment ago. It is clear in the Senator's mind, but I think we should develop it for the legislative history.

I think almost everyone believes that a retail or service establishment would be brought under the Minimum Wage Act by this bill if its annual gross volume of sales were $1 million or more. Is it not correct that even though it were determined that a retail or service establishment had an annual gross volume of sales of $1 million or more it would not be brought under the terms of the bill, unless it was an enterprise which actually affected commerce.

Mr. KENNEDY. That is correct.

Mr. COOPER. The definition provided by the bill of "an activity affecting commerce," is that it is an "activity, business, or industry in commerce, or necessary to commerce, or to the production of goods for, or the distribution of goods in commerce."

My point is this, and I should like to have the Senator give me his interpretation, because I have not been certain of his views from the debate: Is it not correct that the bill intends two tests to determine whether retail or service establishments would come under the terms of this bill? The first is that the establishment must do a million dollars or more in business. The second, if the question is raised, is that the Wage and Hour Division or the courts would have to establish that it was a business which actually affected interstate commerce, in the sense that it is an activity, business, or industry, in commerce or necessary to commerce or to the production of goods for, or the distribution of goods in commerce.

Mr. KENNEDY. The Senator is correct. There are those two tests.

Mr. RANDOLPH. Mr. President, will the Senator from Massachusetts yield for a question?

Mr. KENNEDY. I yield.

Mr. RANDOLPH. Is it not true that the National Labor Relations Board protects a retail establishment with $500,000 of gross annual sales from organizational picketing, and also protects the right of its employees to organize?

Mr. KENNEDY. The Senator is correct. They draw the line at $500,000.

Mr. RANDOLPH. I think it is important to say, that a "bogeyman" is being raised when we talk about a further invasion—of Federal power which does not now exist in a present statute.

Mr. KENNEDY. The Senator is correct. The figure is $500,000 for retail. It is $50,000 outflow or inflow for most other enterprises. It is that low.

Mr. RANDOLPH. I thank the Senator.

Mr. GOLDWATER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. KENNEDY. I yield.

Mr. GOLDWATER. So that we may understand this relationship of the NLRB to the present bill, what the NLRB, through the Taft-Hartley Act, is trying to do is to regulate those things in commerce which can obstruct commerce or restrict commerce. How the Senator can say that wages obstruct or restrict commerce, I do not know. I do not agree that there is a comparison between the $500,000 figure used by the NLRB and the provision mentioned. As I am sure the Senator knows, the figure of $500,000 can be changed by a ruling of the Board at any time, either up or down. The bill would introduce a new interpretation of the effect on commerce. I think that is the big field of argument. First, the NLRB, through the Taft-Hartley Act, is trying to regulate commerce by preventing strikes and so forth which would obstruct commerce, while in the Senator's argument he is suggesting that wages also affect the flow of commerce.

Mr. KENNEDY. I do not think there is any question of the power of the Government to do this. It is a question as to desirability of striking a new area.

Mr. GOLDWATER. A new frontier?

Mr. KENNEDY. My voice is going again.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. KENNEDY. I yield.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. I was not sure I understood the answer to the question of the Senator from Kentucky. I was listening to the question. I know what the question is, but I did not quite understand the Senator's answer.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time of the Senator from Massachusetts has again expired.

Mr. KENNEDY. How much time do the opponents have remaining?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator has 35 minutes remaining.

Mr. KENNEDY. The Senator from Kentucky asked whether there were two tests, one of which is the $1 million test and the other whether the business would affect commerce, using the definition in the bill. I said, "That is correct."

Mr. FULBRIGHT. I cannot think of any kind of store that does $1 million worth of business or even $500,000 in these days, which, under the interpretation of the commerce clause by the courts, would not be considered in interstate commerce.

Mr. KENNEDY. I believe the Senator is correct.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. The Senator from Colorado tried to develop this point the other day. There are two tests. While it is theoretically accurate as of 100 years ago, today under present interpretations of the law by the Court it is not accurate as a practical matter. What I think is important is that we not mislead stores or the public. I think there is still some way to determine, under present conditions, whether or not a business is in interstate commerce. Our view is that the Court has more or less given up its judicial function, and there is an obligation on the Senate to begin to exercise part of that function in order to retain some kind of distinction between interstate and intrastate commerce.

For that reason I favor the Monroney amendment. There is contained in the Monroney amendment a distinction which is clear, one that I can understand, and one that is in accord with the traditional concepts of interstate commerce.

I do not know of any kind of retail business that would not be considered subject to coverage, judged purely by the volume of business, under present interpretations of the law by the Supreme Court. So I believe for all practical purposes the amount of business is one test.

Mr. CARROLL. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. KENNEDY. I yield.

Mr. CARROLL. Last night we discussed this subject and I thought we had laid this ghost to rest. I admit that the Senator from Kentucky raised some points last evening which are very close constitutional questions. First there was the Wagner Act. Later, when some of us were in the House of Representatives, there came before us the so-called Taft-Hartley bill. It was said that that bill would restore the balance between management and labor.

Small businessmen sought to come under the commerce clause of the Constitution in order that the National Labor Relations Board might have jurisdiction over their cases. The courts have gone to great lengths—though not on the minimum wage question—to try to give protection to small businessmen. The courts have gone far, as the able Senator from North Carolina [Mr. ERVIN] said, in 25 years in their interpretations of constitutional law. We have been moving into this field and broadening the scope of the commerce clause of the Constitution. This move has been for the benefit of the small businessmen who wanted protection.

Curiously enough, when we consider a different type of law, a minimum wage bill, those who formerly wished for protection are the same folks who now say, "We do not want to come under the commerce clause."

I have been listening very carefully to the able Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. MONRONEY], and I know he presents his amendment with great sincerity. I know exactly what his position is, and there is considerable merit to it.

I know the voice of the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. KENNEDY] has worn thin in speaking on this subject, but as I understand the situation, many small manufacturing businesses, whose employees are now in the stream of interstate commerce, are not exempt on either an area test or a gross income test. Is that not so?

Mr. KENNEDY. The Senator is correct.

Mr. CARROLL. For the first time in 22 years we seek to broaden the language of the act. The able Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. KENNEDY] says that all the people he mentioned are engaged in interstate commerce. I cannot quite agree with that expression because there are many people in my State——

Mr. FULBRIGHT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. CARROLL. I shall be happy to yield when I finish.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. I would like to finish and then let the Senator from Colorado make his speech. I had only one small point to make.

Mr. CARROLL. Did the Senator from Arkansas yield to me or did I secure my time from the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. KENNEDY]?

Mr. FULBRIGHT. I do not want to argue with the Senator.

Mr. CARROLL. I wish to talk on the real point contained in the Monroney amendment, because I think it is a point not yet discussed——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time of the Senator has expired.

Mr. KENNEDY. I yield 10 additional minutes.

Mr. CARROLL. I do not wish to drive the Senator from Arkansas away. He is my friend. I will yield to him for his observation, but I wish to speak on the Monroney amendment.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. I wish to make this point, and I shall make it quickly. For practical purposes, there is no longer a double standard. As the Senator from Oregon very frankly said, all employees are covered, if we wish to consider the question in that way. The question is not how far we can go under the commerce clause; it is a question of how far it is wise to go as a matter of policy. I think the Supreme Court would sustain the act if we attempted to cover all employees. If I judge correctly the recent tendencies of the Court, I think they are now more of a political nature than they are judicial. I am only saying that the Senate now has the responsibility to use some caution and a sense of proportion. It is a matter of public policy as to whether or not we wish to cover all of the little firms, even though we can do so under the Constitution. The amendment of the Senator from Oklahoma seeks to draw a line. It is more in keeping with the traditional and original concept of "interstate commerce." If we agree to the amendment as a matter of policy, it takes us back to what I think is an understandable distinction between intrastate and interstate commerce. That is the only point I wish to make.

Mr. CARROLL. I respect the opinion of the able Senator from Arkansas.

Mr. LAUSCHE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. CARROLL. Yesterday I surrendered the floor to the Senator from Ohio; today I am going to be a little more firm for awhile, and then I shall be happy to yield. The Senator from Arkansas and I had some discussion in the Senate Chamber last night.

I have more confidence in the Supreme Court than has the Senator from Arkansas. I can understand his apprehension about the rulings of the Supreme Court, but I think generally the Supreme Court and the lower courts, as I have examined their decisions, have made an objective appraisal of the facts in determining whether or not a business is in the stream of interstate commerce under existing law and under existing decisions. That is the opinion of the junior Senator from Colorado. It may not square with all that we were taught 25 or 30 years ago, but the Nation has changed economically. There are many changes in the world, which Senators ought to recognize.

I offer this constructive criticism of the Monroney amendment. There is considerable merit to it. I have had the opportunity to discuss the amendment with the able Senator from Oklahoma, and I understand what he is endeavoring to do.

This thought has occurred to me in the debate: What about all the small manufacturers who right now have employees in interstate commerce? There is no exemption for them, and these small businesses exist by the hundreds of thousands. There is no gross income test with respect to them, and there is no area test under which they might be exempt.

For the first time we are moving into retail trade, and what do we see? We are asked to accept the criterion of a gross income of $1 million, and we are also asked to give area protection. The able Senator from Massachusetts has put his finger on the problem. This is not the way to legislate. If we do not want the retail and service trades to come under the law, why not strike out these businesses entirely? But if we intend to legislate for these and other businesses we ought to do so equitably.

I am amazed that the able Senator from Ohio would support the Monroney amendment after his statement. He talked about the Hilton, the Statler, and the Sheraton hotel chains. We are asked to give special privileges to members of particular groups. Why do we not enact as equitable a piece of legislation as we can under the circumstances?

Mr. LAUSCHE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. CARROLL. I am happy to yield, because I mentioned the Senator's name.

Mr. LAUSCHE. The statement I made is that if the principle of the bill pending before us is sound and equitable, there is no justification for granting exemptions to the Statler chain, the Hilton chain, and the Sheraton chain of hotels. If any industries fall within the definition of "business affecting commerce," those hotels do. I suggest that if they are going to be exempted, there is some mysterious reason for the exemption.

Mr. CARROLL. The reason is not mysterious. It is practical. The House has passed a bill also. The bill of the Senator from Massachusetts, as the Senator has said, has been the subject of a great deal of work for over a year. The purpose is to try to extend coverage to some of the lowest paid groups in our whole economy. There is nothing mysterious about it. If we cannot get all we want—and we have learned this in our legislative experience—or if we cannot get a whole loaf, we take half a loaf. Most of the time we are lucky to get a few slices.

Mr. LAUSCHE. I should like to ask the Senator another question.

Mr. CARROLL. I yield.

Mr. LAUSCHE. If a hardware store in Denver, Colo., is doing a million dollars' worth of business, and because of that fact is to be covered by the law, how can the Senator justify exempting the Statler, the Hilton, or Sheraton chains?

Mr. CARROLL. So far as the junior Senator from Colorado is concerned, he has the same trepidation about it.

Mr. LAUSCHE. The Senator has not answered my question.

Mr. CARROLL. I will answer it, but in my time and in my fashion.

Mr. LAUSCHE. If the Senator can answer the question he is capable of an intelligence that is quite extraordinary.

Mr. CARROLL. I believe I can answer it. Any business under the bill which is affected by commerce—as that term is interpreted—which grosses a million dollars is going to be covered by the Kennedy bill. It is that simple. That is all there is to it. If I have a hardware store in Denver and it is making a million dollars gross—if it gets its axes or razor blades from Ohio, or gets its equipment from the steel mills of Ohio—I have to pay the minimum wage to the employees. It is that simple. There is nothing involved about it. That is the whole purpose of the bill. For 22 years retail and service establishments have been exempt. Now for the first time we are going to try to cover them.

Mr. LAUSCHE. What about hotels?

Mr. CARROLL. The junior Senator from Colorado believes that hotels should be included too.

Mr. LAUSCHE. That is logical.

Mr. CARROLL. The junior Senator from Colorado always tries to be logical. Sometimes he does not succeed in reaching that goal. As the minority leader has said, many times in the legislative halls we must compromise. We do not get all we want. I suspect we are not going to get all we want in the pending bill.

Mr. DIRKSEN. I am sure the Senator will not.

Mr. CARROLL. I know how hard the Senator from Massachusetts has worked on the bill. In my opinion, after listening to the debate, the proposal of the Senator from Oklahoma is not an equitable proposal. I intend to vote against it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Massachusetts has the floor.

Mr. KENNEDY. Do we have 10 minutes?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator has 1 minute remaining.

Mr. MONRONEY. I will yield some time to the Senator from Colorado. I would be glad to yield him 5 minutes.

Mr. CARROLL. The junior Senator from Colorado has finished his part in the debate. If what I have said produces a compromise, I will be happy, provided it is a proper compromise. Does the Senator from Ohio wish to talk any more about axes and steel?

Mr. LAUSCHE. I would like to ask the Senator one more question.

Mr. CARROLL. I am always happy to engage in colloquy with the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. LAUSCHE. Yesterday afternoon the Senator from Colorado disagreed with my statement that all business within the country comes within the operation of the bill if it does a million dollars' worth of business. The Senator from Colorado disagreed. Today the Senator from Massachusetts, the sponsor of the pending bill, within the hearing of the Senator from Colorado, said it does cover every business. Which of the two is right?

Mr. CARROLL. I cannot look into the mind of the Senator from Massachusetts. If I understood the question propounded by the Senator from Kentucky to the Senator from Massachusetts, I thought he sustained my viewpoint. Perhaps the Senator from Ohio did not hear it too well.

Mr. LAUSCHE. I heard it.

Mr. CARROLL. I know what the Senator from Massachusetts said.

Mr. LAUSCHE. It was the Senator from Arkansas who put the question, not the Senator from Kentucky.

Mr. CARROLL. The Senator from Kentucky [Mr. COOPER] put the question also. We had the discussion last night with the Senator from Arkansas and the Senator from Ohio. I can understand the Senator's feelings about the bill, but I take the position that there are certain intrastate activities that belong to my State. I do not care what the able Senator from Massachusetts has said, or what the able Senator from Arkansas has said. I do not care even what my distinguished friend from Ohio may have said. There are certain activities in my State which are intrastate, over which my State has jurisdiction.

I have not been sent to Washington to liquidate the intrastate activities within my State.

I agree with the able Senator from Ohio that this is a very difficult line to define precisely. It is very difficult. The Supreme Court decisions and other Federal court decisions which have arisen, have arisen not under the minimum wage bill but under the National Labor Relations Board activities. That is where they have been expanding slowly the concept of interstate commerce on behalf of some of the very businessmen who are now fighting this bill.

This to me is an inconsistency. It is not fully comprehended by the junior Senator from Colorado.

Mr. LAUSCHE. I have the deepest respect for the Senator from Colorado. I know he expresses his honest convictions, even though they are not in agreement with those expressed by other Senators. I am happy to hear him say that in his opinion the intrastate affairs of Colorado ought to be protected without interference by Congress.

Mr. CARROLL. That is the point I wished to clarify.

Mr. MAGNUSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. CARROLL. I yield.

Mr. MAGNUSON. We are talking a great deal about intrastate matters. Congress could not constitutionally pass a bill affecting intrastate commerce.

Mr. CARROLL. The Senator is right.

Mr. MAGNUSON. If it affects intrastate commerce, we have no constitutional authority to deal with it.

Mr. CARROLL. That is correct.

Mr. MAGNUSON. What we are talking about, and what the courts rule on, is interstate commerce. That is up to the courts.

Mr. CARROLL. That is correct.

Mr. MAGNUSON. So all the talk about intrastate and interstate comes down to the fact that Congress could not legally pass a bill, or constitutionally pass a bill, to affect business in intrastate, even if it wanted to do so. We could write books on this subject. That has been interpreted by the Court.

Mr. CARROLL. That is correct.

Mr. MAGNUSON. Regardless of how the bill is worded, it can affect only interstate commerce.

Mr. CARROLL. That is correct.

Mr. MAGNUSON. What is interstate commerce must be interpreted by the courts. There are those who disagree with the interpretations of the Court, and others agree with them. The fact remains that we could not constitutionally affect what the Senator from Colorado is trying to protect in his State, whatever language we put in the bill.

Mr. CARROLL. The distinguished Senator from Washington is absolutely correct. This was all discussed last evening. I used almost the same words. The Senate has no power to pass a bill affecting intrastate activities in any State. If we should pass a bill affecting intrastate business, it would be passed on an unconstitutional basis. The able Senator is absolutely right.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. CARROLL. I am ready to yield the floor. I first yield to the Senator from Tennessee.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, I congratulate the Senator from Colorado upon the eloquence and erudition of his address; but also I commend him for affording enough time, which I believe will produce a settlement of this question on the floor.

Mr. CARROLL. I thank the able Senator from Tennessee. If there is any way in which I can contribute to the settlement of a very complex question, I am happy to do so.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, will the Senator from Colorado yield?

Mr. CARROLL. I yield.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Pertinent to the observation made by the distinguished Senator from Washington, I call attention to the old Wrightwood Dairy case, which arose in a little town in northern Illinois, to which it was sought to apply an agricultural milk marketing order. The dairy took the position that it was not under the jurisdiction of such an order coming from the Federal Government. The record showed that the Wrightwood Dairy did not buy so much as 1 pint of milk outside the State of Illinois. The record showed that the Wrightwood Dairy did not sell a pint of milk outside the State of Illinois.

When the court ruled on the matter, it said that the milk the company bought and sold entered into the stream of commerce which might be competitive with interstate commerce.

So the minute we put words on paper and let 5 or 7 or 9 men, robed in black, and sitting on a bench, take a look and try to determine the intent of Congress, we never can tell what will happen. If they are given that chance, they may go as far as they possibly can.

Therefore, the responsibility is here, if we are to preserve the commerce clause of the Constitution, to make certain that not even learned justices on a court can mistake the intent of Congress, as divined from the discussions which take place.

Mr. CARROLL. Will not the Senator from Illinois agree that that is precisely what we did 22 years ago? We exempted the retail trades.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Oh, but go back and examine the definition of "commerce" in 1939. The definition was commerce between the States. There was not the refinement which is in the bill: "activities affecting commerce"; "enterprises engaged in activities affecting commerce."

Finally the sky becomes the limit, because under the liberal definitions in the bill, I can envision no business, today, large or small, which would not be brought within the purview of the bill, simply because of that broadening of the commerce clause.

That is the fundamental problem before us. It is not the question of the wage. We can agree upon the wage, I am sure. It is not the question of exemptions which were specifically written into the original bill. It is not particularly overtime. All those differences we could easily compose. The question is how far will the National Legislature go in twisting and distorting the commerce clause, when every Member of Congress is duty bound, under his oath, as he raises his hand, to uphold and defend the Constitution? Of course, one upholds and defends the Constitution on the basis of how he reads it and how he interprets it. But we have had enough experience now, and I shall simply not go any further down that road. I believe we have gone far enough.

Mr. MAGNUSON. I do not disagree with the premise of the Senator from Illinois at all. What we are arguing is how the language shall be interpreted; how far we shall go in saying what is interstate commerce. I believe the Senator from Illinois will agree with me that if a business is engaged in intrastate commerce, and it is so interpreted—there may be some doubt or question about it—then we have no right to pass a law affecting it. To do so would be unconstitutional. But we have gone a long way.

Mr. DIRKSEN. The distinguished Senator from Washington was a Member of the House of Representatives when I was there. He will recall that we passed a Bituminous Coal Act.

Mr. MAGNUSON. That is correct.

Mr. DIRKSEN. The then President of the United States sent a message to Congress. What did he say? He said, "Let no doubts about the constitutionality of the bill, no matter how reasonable, stand in the way of its expeditious enactment." That was the language Franklin Roosevelt sent to Congress.

We passed the bill and put it on the books. It harassed the coal industry; but, thank God—and I say it reverently—it has been expunged from the books.

We had the same experience with the Potato Act.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time of the Senator has expired.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Will someone give me 1 minute? [Laughter.]

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, I will yield a minute to the Senator from Illinois.

Mr. DIRKSEN. The same thing happened in connection with the Potato Act. Henry Wallace was to screen potatoes. All potatoes of a given size could be marketed; those of a smaller size probably had to be used for hog feed. So the language became a matter of interpretation; it became a matter of commerce to send a bag of potatoes across a State line.

What has happened to the Potato Act? It has been wiped out. That is only a caution to this body to be just a little more mindful of that organic document which has been responsible for the growth and progress of this country.

Mr. MAGNUSON. I agree with the Senator from Illinois that we are dealing in small potatoes, so far as wages are concerned. The Constitution is still with us. It provides that we may deal only with interstate commerce. We may have disagreements about what is interstate commerce. But if the commerce is intrastate, we cannot do anything in the way of legislation.

Mr. President, how much time remains?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Massachusetts has 8 minutes remaining; the Senator from Oklahoma has 20 minutes remaining.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, from the time of the Senator from Oklahoma, I yield 10 minutes to the Senator from Washington.

Mr. MAGNUSON. I have nothing more to say. Knowing that Senators want to vote, and with the permission of the Senator from Massachusetts, I will yield back the remainder of the time on our side.

Mr. ANDERSON. No.

Mr. MAGNUSON. I will yield 5 minutes to the Senator from Colorado.

Mr. ALLOTT. Mr. President, I am not on the side of the Senator from Washington on this amendment. The Senator from Oklahoma has agreed to yield time to me, if I can get his attention.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Oklahoma yield time to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. MONRONEY. Mr. President, I yield 3 minutes to the distinguished Senator from Colorado.

Mr. ALLOTT. Mr. President, I support the Monroney amendment. I hope, in a few moments, that I can make one thing very clear. Some time ago, in a colloquy, the chairman of the subcommittee said in answer to a question that there were really two standards: First, the amount of business had to be $1 million annually; second, it had to be affecting commerce. The phrase "affecting commerce" came from the National Labor Relations Act. The Supreme Court has interpreted that Act and said that it is the absolute limit to which Congress can go in legislating under the commerce clause of the Constitution. So in using the term "affecting commerce" in the National Labor Relations Act, Congress went as far as it could go in legislating under it.

When the distinction is attempted to be made on the floor of the Senate that there are businesses which are not involved in interstate commerce, I say that under the interpretation by the Supreme Court of the National Labor Relations Act, a retailer in a small town who was purchasing, through a wholesaler, shirts which came from another State would be affecting commerce.

The only supposition one can make—and perhaps it is a dangerous supposition to make—is that the Supreme Court will put the same interpretation upon "affecting commerce" this time as they did when they interpreted the National Labor Relations Act. So what we will end with, if we keep the bill as it was reported by the committee, based on the existing definitions, will be the interpretation that there is almost no limit to "affecting commerce."

I know the National Labor Relations Board has said to certain persons who appealed to the Board for relief, "You are not large enough, you are not significant enough, and we will not give you relief." Nevertheless, the fact is that they still have jurisdiction of these workers, even though they are engaged in strictly intrastate commerce.

So I believe that the only conclusion which can be drawn is that this measure does not really include two criteria, but includes only the $1 million criterion, because if the Supreme Court puts on this measure the same interpretation that it puts on the National Labor Relations Act, this measure will affect anyone who ships goods, even within the boundaries of a State, if the goods move from a jobber to a wholesaler and then to a retailer; such persons will be covered by the act and will be subject to the application of the clause "affecting commerce."

Therefore, this leaves in the committee bill only the $1 million criterion.

Mr. MAGNUSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time yielded to the Senator has expired.

Mr. MAGNUSON. Mr. President, I yield myself 3 minutes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Washington is recognized for 3 minutes.

Mr. MAGNUSON. Mr. President, I am sure everyone agrees with the Senator's statement that today, as a result of court interpretations, practically all business is held to be in interstate commerce. There may be arguments as to whether that should be so; but since the writing of the Constitution, court interpretations have gone a long way, and so has this legislative body.

As the Senator knows, I serve on the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce. There are referred to that committee many bills which are introduced under the guise of dealing with matters affecting interstate commerce, although probably technically the bills should not be considered by the Congress. If it were clearly established from the facts and the circumstances, that a business was an intrastate business, Congress could not take action regarding it. But I believe that field is a rather narrow one.

The bill provides the $1 million limitation. Some oppose that. Nevertheless, I favor the proposed extension. But I believe we should not become involved in any interpretation to the effect that the Congress can take action in regard to intrastate commerce.

The Senator from Colorado is an excellent lawyer, and he knows that Congress cannot take action in regard to intrastate matters.

Mr. ALLOTT. Yes, I agree that Congress cannot take action which would affect intrastate business. That is the point. If we adopt this proposed language, we shall be broadening the application of the National Labor Relations Act, which, as it now stands, applies to wage disputes which constitute obstructions of commerce, and we shall be making possible additional interpretations, with the result that it would be held that in this country practically no business above the $1 million level would not be affecting commerce.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator's time has expired.

Mr. MONRONEY. Mr. President, I have no desire to prolong the debate on this amendment. I have used most of the time under my control.

I believe that most Senators now understand what this amendment will do. If some other Senator desires to speak at this point, I shall be willing to yield some of the small amount of time which still remains under my control. If not, I am prepared to yield back the remainder of the time under my control, if the Senator in charge of the time on the other side is prepared to do likewise.

Mr. President, prior to concluding the debate I ask unanimous consent that at this time there may be a quorum call, and that the time required for it not be charged to the time available to either side.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. MONRONEY. I now suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. GOLDWATER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

Mr. MAGNUSON. I object.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Objection is heard, and the clerk will resume the call of the roll.

The legislative clerk resumed the call of the roll.

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

Mr. GOLDWATER. Mr. President, I object.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Objection is heard, and the clerk will resume the call of the roll.

The legislative clerk resumed the call of the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

The PRESIDING OFFICER. A quorum is present.

The Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, may I ask how much time we have?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The proponents have 17 minutes; the opposition, 5.

Mr. KENNEDY. I wonder if the Senator from Oklahoma will yield 5 minutes to me.

Mr. MONRONEY. I yield 5 minutes to the Senator.

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, I plead with the Senate to pause just long enough to listen and ponder a legal argument which I wish to make in opposition to the Monroney amendment.

Mr. KENNEDY. I yield 4 minutes to the Senator from Oregon.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Oregon is recognized for 4 minutes.

Mr. MORSE. I say to the Senate that if it adopts the Monroney amendment in its present form it will make a serious legal mistake, about which I am sure Senators cannot be fully aware because of its complicated nature. Senators will make a mistake in regard to a legal matter that has not been brought before the Committee on Labor and Public Welfare. This aspect of the Monroney amendment has never been heard by the Labor and Public Welfare Committee in the course of our hearings this year. There has not been a single legal expert and authority called before our committee to testify on the legal effects of the Monroney amendment. It is a mistake to ever vote on curbstone legal opinions rendered on the floor of the Senate in the heat of debate without the benefit of thorough legal research on the legal issues involved.

I do not think that, in the rush hour in which we are now debating in the Senate, we should go headlong into adopting an amendment that will have all of the bad legal consequences of this amendment. It should have far more consideration than the Senate has given to it. It should be backed up by a legal brief and a thorough committee hearing on the legal effects of the amendment.

If the Senate adopts the Monroney amendment in its present form, it will be inconsistent with a long line of U.S. Supreme Court decisions that have been based on two premises: First, the Court's application of the commerce clause of the Constitution; and, second, the action of the Congress in the passage of legislation which the Supreme Court has applied.

I now refer to my first premise. If the Senate adopts the Monroney amendment in its present form, it will be failing to recognize the validity of the Fairlawn Markets case (353 U.S. 22) and the Florida Hotel case (358 U.S. 99). I discussed last evening these two cases in respect to their application of the interstate commerce clause of the Constitution. These are two among many decisions of the U.S. Supreme Court in which the Court has held it is not necessary that there be operations in two or more States; cases in which the Court has ruled that the issue is whether or not the given business substantially affects interstate commerce. That is what the Court found in the Fairlawn Markets case—the Ohio Butcher case—in which the Court concluded that the operations of that particular business, carried on in a single State, substantially affected interstate commerce.

Do my colleagues mean to tell me that in the course of this short debate in the Senate we should proceed to adopt an amendment that will ignore a long line of Supreme Court decisions in respect to the meaning of interstate commerce without hearings and deliberations by the Senate Labor Committee and without the benefit of testimony of constitutional law authorities given at hearings before the Labor and Public Welfare Committee?

I have great respect for the judgment of each individual Senator, but I say, most respectfully, the Senate cannot act this afternoon with full knowledge of the implications of the Monroney amendment unless there is a body of testimony and evidence on which to form a competent judgment. The Senate does not have, at this time, the requisite testimony and evidence.

Second, I point out that the Senate will be ignoring congressional action itself, because when the Congress adopted the National Labor Relations Act back in 1935, and amended it with the Taft-Hartley Act in 1947 it provided in that law language which the Supreme Court has applied time and time again in its decisions, which language cannot be reconciled with the Monroney amendment.

The Court has held in those decisions that under our Constitution the States are preempted from taking jurisdiction in a case over which the National Labor Relations Board has jurisdiction, as was attempted in the Fairlawn case. The Court held that the Congress itself, in the National Labor Relations Act, enacted legislation which provides that if a business substantially affects commerce, it falls under the jurisdiction of the National Labor Relations Board.

With no more consideration than has been given to this important and complicated legal problem than the Senate has given to it in this debate—and, in my judgment, the Senate does not have before it the evidence on which to make a sound and sober judgment—it is proposed this afternoon that we adopt the Monroney amendment, which conflicts with a whole line of decisions of the U.S. Supreme Court in respect to the application of the interstate commerce clause of the Constitution.

If it follows this course of action, the Senate is going to produce great confusion in the law, and, in my judgment, is going to set back progress in the economic field in respect to fair labor standards. Do not forget, the economy of the country has changed since 1938, when the Fair Labor Standards Act was adopted.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time of the Senator from Massachusetts has expired.

Mr. MORSE. Will the Senator from Oklahoma yield me 1 minute?

Mr. MONRONEY. Mr. President, how much time do I have?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Seventeen minutes.

Mr. MONRONEY. I yield 2 minutes to the Senator from Oregon.

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, the economy of the country has changed since 1938. Big business has supplanted small business to an ever-increasing degree. Today a great mercantile establishment may operate in one State, but may not operate in no other State. It can be a huge mercantile establishment, the business for which really comes from many States and the supplies for which come from many States. That is characteristic of the growth of the retail industry of this country as well as many other businesses.

The issue before us is whether we are going to continue to exercise the Federal power, recognized by the Supreme Court under the commerce clause, to regulate business that substantially affects interstate commerce, and thereby protect the workers.

Under the Monroney amendment, we could have a store with branches in two States, doing a total of a million dollars worth of business which would be covered by the Federal law. However, there could be a business in one State, located only in one State, doing $25 million worth of business, and it would not be covered. That is one of the ramifications of the amendment.

Let us consider the practical realities that confront us. I know what is sought. It is sought to give some relief for the automobile business. It is sought to give some relief for the hotel industry. It is sought to give some relief for the restaurant industry.

Mr. President, I am a bargainer, too. When confronted with the realities of a legislative situation, I will bargain if necessary. But I plead with Senators, do not constrict the already recognized Federal power on the floor of the Senate this afternoon. I understand the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. ANDERSON] is thinking about offering an amendment. If he does I will support that amendment, if necessary.

The amendment, I understand, will have an effect in regard to certain exemptions to be applied to restaurants, hotels, and automobile businesses. Let us deal with those directly. If we must compromise on coverage under this bill in order to defeat the Monroney amendment with its serious legal consequences in respect to the application of the interstate commerce clause, then let me say I am ready to compromise. In doing so, I compromise no principle. In part, I would enter into such a compromise on coverage, in order to protect a very vital legal principle relative to the application of the interstate commerce clause of the Constitution. I think the decisions of the U.S. Supreme Court, to which I have referred, are great legal landmarks in protecting millions of workers from exploitation by the economic strong. I do not propose to take that protection away from them by voting for the Monroney amendment. I am sorry if it is necessary to compromise on the coverage of workers in the hotel, restaurant, and automobile businesses, in order to enhance our chances of defeating the Monroney amendment, but I shall do it rather than permit a greater injury to millions of workers.

I close with the plea, do not vote for the Monroney amendment in its present form. Vote it down, and let us join, if we have to bargain on this matter, on the Anderson coverage amendment. I pledge now that if the Anderson coverage compromise has to be made I will support it. If we have to exempt hotels, restaurants, and automobile agencies, let us do it under a separate amendment offered by the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. ANDERSON].

Let us not strike a blow against the U.S. Supreme Court by adopting the Monroney amendments—restrictions on the meaning of interstate commerce.

Mr. BUSH. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. MONRONEY. I yield 3 minutes to the distinguished Senator from Connecticut.

Mr. BUSH. Mr. President, in response to the eloquent appeal of my friend from Oregon, I should like to observe that the job of the Supreme Court is to interpret the law and to interpret the Constitution of the United States. In order to interpret the law the Court must know what is the intent of the Congress. I am not in the least bit frightened about upsetting any Supreme Court decisions, if we do not believe they are correct in interpreting the Constitution in the light of the laws which have been enacted by Congress. Therefore, I do not think we are taking any chances at all, if it is the will of Congress to adopt the Monroney amendment, which will make very clear what the Congress thinks ought to be interpreted as intrastate commerce or interstate commerce.

The Monroney amendment has one very great thing in its favor. It is obsolutely specific. One must do business in two or more States. To me that is the original meaning of the Constitution as to interstate commerce, as it was years ago and as it is today. I do not think we should be frightened by any fear of upsetting any Supreme Court decision. I am not sure how many decisions we would upset if we agreed to the Monroney amendment. It is time that we face up to the question of what is interstate commerce and what is intrastate commerce.

I believe the Monroney amendment points up the problem very, very clearly. In fact, that is the whole point of the Monroney amendment. I believe the amendment should be agreed to.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BUSH. I yield.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, I say to my friend from Oregon that his whole argument falls, because the Monroney amendment would not affect any language in the Kennedy bill relating to activities affecting commerce, which was sought to be used to establish the constitutional basis. The $1 million cutoff for businesses, and to operate in two or more States, is a legislative standard, not a constitutional standard, so the eloquent and vigorous argument falls of its own weight.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BUSH. Mr. President, I yield back such time as I have remaining.

Mr. MONRONEY. Mr. President, I yield to the Senator from South Dakota.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. How much time does the Senator from Oklahoma yield to the Senator from South Dakota?

Mr. MONRONEY. I yield such time as the Senator may require.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. Mr. President, one of the great advantages of not being a lawyer and serving in this body is that one can read the Constitution by the simple words it contains.

Section 8 of the Constitution merely says that the Congress shall have the power to regulate commerce with foreign nations and among the States. To me this is merely the exercise of the power which Congress has to regulate commerce among the several States. If we wish to say that when a business operates in more than one State such and such a condition shall prevail, that certainly is an exercise of the legislative power of the Congress. It does not seem to me this enters into defining whether something else is interstate commerce or not. Certainly if commerce moves across a State line it is commerce among the States. Merely as a matter of policy we can say that when a business operates in more than one State such and such is the situation.

Mr. MONRONEY. Mr. President, I yield 1 minute to the Senator from Washington.

Mr. MAGNUSON. Mr. President, I merely wish to add for the record, since I did not have a chance when we were discussing the question of intrastate and interstate commerce, that I propose to vote, if a motion is made, to table the Monroney amendment, with the understanding that I shall have an opportunity to vote for the amendment to be offered by the Senator from New Mexico. I think what the Senator from Oregon had to say was well said.

Another thing with regard to the Monroney amendment is that it might cause more practical trouble, and a lot of inequities. When we start to divide business which is generally in interstate commerce and to say that if business is not done separately in two or more States the business can escape the minimum-wage law, I can visualize a big rash of separate corporations being set up all over the country to evade the small payment which would be given workers under the law.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Oklahoma is recognized.

Mr. MONRONEY. Mr. President, before the distinguished Senator from Washington moves to table my amendment——

Mr. MAGNUSON. I did not say I would.

Mr. MONRONEY. I understand the motion will be made.

Mr. President, I wish to say that my amendment would merely preserve the foundation on which the wage and hour power of Congress has been exercised for 22 years. This has nothing to do with the long line of Supreme Court decisions with regard to the NLRB.

The power of Congress to regulate interstate commerce is well established. That has been the base upon which for 22 years the act which the Democrats proudly proclaim has existed. Now we are asked in the short session of Congress, which the distinguished Senator from Oregon mentioned, to reverse the 22 years of history and to use a dollar test of sales volume, to decide whether one is to be regulated in interstate commerce, regardless of whether one sells merchandise beyond 10 or 12 blocks of a small town, if it happens to be $1 million or more in volume. It is as simple as that. Perhaps the Congress could write a new definition of interstate commerce. I do not think we will, because I think we are wise to confine the exercise of powers of Congress affecting commerce to the commerce affecting two or more States.

We have an amendment which will add up to 3,800,000 in coverage, under the present construction of the Constitution. We should not try to get a few hundred thousand more by stretching the Constitution. I do not think that is in the interest of good government or in the interest of sound legislation.

I ask Senators to vote down the motion to table, if made, and then to vote for the amendment on its merits.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Oklahoma yield back his time?

Mr. MONRONEY. I yield back my time.

Mr. LAUSCHE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Oklahoma yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. MONRONEY. I yield.

Mr. KENNEDY. Does the Senator from Oklahoma agree to strike out the $1 million provision?

Mr. MONRONEY. I will agree to strike out the $1 million provision, because actually it is a supplement to the test of multi-State operation. The foundation on which we must rest, instead of being quicksand, ought to be granite. The multi-State operation is what I am interested in, and I will be happy to strike out the provision to which the Senator from Massachusetts refers, at his request, knowing at the same time that he does not choose to support my amendment. I believe it may bring a couple of hundred thousand more people under the provision.

Mr. President, I modify my amendment as suggested, and ask that it be stated as modified.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The modified amendment of the Senator from Oklahoma will be stated.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. On page 4, line 7, it is proposed to strike the first paragraph and insert the words "(1) any such enterprise which operates retail or service establishments in two or more States."

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will state it.

Mr. JAVITS. Is the modification which is made in the amendment of the Senator from Oklahoma as of right, or does it require consent; and does it enlarge the time for debate on the Senator's amendment?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The modification is made as of right. It does not add to the time.

Mr. JAVITS. I should like to ask the Senator if he will yield to me a minute or two. I am opposed to the amendment.

Mr. MONRONEY. I have no further use for time. However, I intended to yield to the distinguished Senator from Ohio, who is on his feet.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Mr. President, I ask that the clerk reread the amendment. It was not heard because of the uproar.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the clerk will restate the amendment.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. On page 4, line 7, it is proposed to strike the first paragraph and insert the words "(1) any such enterprise which operates retail or service establishments in two or more States."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Ohio is recognized for 2 minutes.

Mr. LAUSCHE. Mr. President, I suggest that we pass upon the amendment of the Senator from Oklahoma strictly upon its merits. In my opinion he has in his amendment a direct nexus between the purpose of the bill and the definition of interstate commerce. I think that we would be committing an indefensible mistake to vote against his amendment with the understanding that by the inclusion of an exemption of hotels from the operation of the bill, new votes will be obtained in support of the original bill. I cannot conceive of the Senate adopting a course by which it will disregard the merits of the amendment of the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. MONRONEY] on the ground that if we yield to the lobby of the hotels, we shall obtain enough votes to pass the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time of the Senator from Ohio has expired.

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, will the Senator from Oklahoma yield 1 minute to me?

Mr. MONRONEY. I yield 1 minute to the Senator from Oregon.

Mr. MORSE. In reply to the legal argument of the Senator from Oklahoma I wish to say that there is no denying the fact that under the language of the amendment of the Senator from Oklahoma, if an establishment had one huge plant in a single State, there could not be a finding that that establishment was so substantially affected by interstate commerce that the Supreme Court could apply the law to that establishment. He has arbitrarily set up a provision, which I submit is highly artificial, that requires an establishment to have business in two States. What has been done under existing Supreme Court decisions is to give the protection of the commerce clause to a good many thousands of workers in individual States. I think that is why we should hesitate a long time before we proceed to reverse that holding of the Court.

I serve notice now that when all time has been exhausted, I shall make a motion to lay the Monroney amendment on the table.

Mr. MONRONEY. Mr. President, the Senator from Ohio has spoken of a multimillion dollar establishment. He well knows that during the 22 years of operation under the act a retail business serving one State had an exemption. So what the Senator is attempting to do is to overturn in this brief bobtail session the 22 years of history which constitutes the foundation of the Wage and Hour Act as it has always existed. Let us not confuse wage and hour legislation with the NLRB, which sometimes has made some strange interpretations of the law.

I yield 2 minutes to the senior Senator from New York.

Mr. JAVITS. I am grateful to my colleague for yielding these 2 minutes. I wish to make an observation on the amendment and the policy involved. The Congress cannot rewrite the commerce clause of the Constitution as defined by the Supreme Court. This is a policy decision which ought to be made strictly on the facts. Shall we confine the bill to retail establishments operating in two or more States? I am against the amendment for this reason. It creates a premium on artificiality. There would be litigation in connection with companies setting up separate corporations in each State, and trying to insulate themselves in terms of this law in order to avoid it.

There will be a problem, for example, in the city of New York. The question will arise as to whether a person should buy goods across the border in Connecticut, or across the border in New Jersey, or whether he should buy them in New York City. In short, the amendment would turn the clock back on the economic organization of the country.

I am not so much worried about the law, because nothing we can do will affect that. The Supreme Court will continue to do business. But what we are asked to do is to rewrite the economic situation in the United States; and that is completely unsound. It cannot be done no matter what legislation we enact here. It will break down.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. MONRONEY. I yield.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I understand from what the Senator has said that if there are two stores, each having a gross of $20,000, in two States, they are covered.

Mr. JAVITS. That is correct.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. But if there is only one store with a $50 million gross in one State, it is exempt.

Mr. JAVITS. Yes.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. MONRONEY. I yield.

Mr. BUTLER. The Supreme Court of the United States has repeatedly held that avoidance is perfectly legal. If a stamp tax of 4 cents on any check of $100 or over is levied, and a person draws two checks for $50 each, he does not pay the tax. What is wrong with that?

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, will the Senator allow me to continue? I do not say it is morally wrong any more than I am too much concerned about the argument of principle.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. All time has expired.

Mr. BUTLER. The Senator is concerned with preserving bad opinions of the Supreme Court.

Mr. JAVITS. I know what I am concerned with, and I will state it. I am concerned with the economic organization of the country. We cannot turn the clock back. If we attempt to do so, the law will break down of itself.

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, I move to lay the Monroney amendment on the table. On this question I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Oregon to lay on the table the amendment of the Senator from Oklahoma, as modified. On this question the yeas and nays have been ordered, and the clerk will call the roll.

The Chief Clerk called the roll.

Mr. MANSFIELD. I announce that the Senator from Missouri [Mr. HENNINGS] is absent because of illness.

I further announce that, if present and voting, the Senator from Missouri [Mr. HENNINGS] would vote "yea."

Mr. KUCHEL. I announce that the Senator from Iowa [Mr. MARTIN] is absent by leave of the Senate on official business.

The result was announced—yeas 50, nays 48, as follows:

NOT VOTING—2

Hennings Martin

So Mr. MORSE's motion to lay on the table Mr. MONRONEY's amendment, as modified, was agreed to.

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, I move that the Senate reconsider the vote by which the motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I move to lay that motion on the table.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. Mr. President, I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Texas to lay on the table the motion of the Senator from Oregon to reconsider the vote by which the motion to lay the Monroney amendment on the table was agreed to.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. President, for myself and on behalf of the Senator from Florida [Mr. SMATHERS] and the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. THURMOND], I offer an amendment and ask for its immediate consideration.

Mr. BUSH. Mr. President, we on this side of the aisle cannot hear what is being said.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senate will be in order. Senators will take their seats. Those desiring to converse will retire to the cloakroom. The Senate will suspend until the Senate is in order.

The clerk will read the amendment.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. On page 17, it is proposed to strike line 8 through line 18, and insert in lieu thereof the following:

(1) any employee employed in a bona fide executive, administrative, or professional capacity, or in the capacity of outside salesman (as such terms are defined and delimited by regulations of the Secretary, subject to the provisions of the Administrative Procedure Act), or any employee employed by a hotel or a motel, or any employee employed by a retail or service establishment who is employed in connection with the preparation or offering of food or beverages to the public for human consumption on the premises, or in any occupation closely related or directly essential thereto.

On page 21, line 13, change the period to a semicolon and insert thereafter the word "or" and the following new paragraph:

(16) any employee employed by an establishment engaged in the business of selling automobiles or trucks, more than 50 per centum of which establishment's annual dollar volume of sales of goods or services (or of both) is made within the State in which the establishment is located and not less than 75 per centum of which establishment's annual dollar volume of sales of goods or services (or of both) is not for resale and is recognized as retail sales or services in the automotive industry.

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. President, on this amendment, I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Illinois will state it.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Has this amendment been printed in the form in which it is now offered?

Mr. ANDERSON. I regret to inform the distinguished minority leader that it has not been printed.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Copies are not available?

Mr. ANDERSON. No; they are not. I can only say that there is a desire on the part of some Senators to make certain that so far as the overtime provisions for employees in the retail automobile business and for employees in hotels, motels, and restaurants are concerned, they will be removed from the provisions of the bill.

Mr. PASTORE. Mr. President, we cannot hear the Senator from New Mexico.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New Mexico will suspend. The Senate will be in order. Senators not desirous of listening to the business of the Senate will leave the Chamber.

The Senator from New Mexico may proceed.

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. President, many Senators who voted to table the Monroney amendment still desire to exempt hotels, motels, restaurants, and retail automobile dealers from the provisions of the bill. We realize that those businesses will have some real problems with respect to the overtime provision. I am perfectly willing to have members of the committee, who are more familiar with the problem, make their own explanations. I am particularly happy that the able Senator from Florida [Mr. SMATHERS] is present because he has discussed the situation with many Senators.

It was merely suggested that an amendment of this nature should be ready in case the Monroney amendment was tabled. I believe the action which is proposed by the amendment should be taken, and taken quickly.

I believe the able Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. KENNEDY], who is in general charge of the bill, realizes that the adoption of this amendment will not do irreparable harm. It may remove from the provisions of the bill about a million workers: 400,000 in the restaurant and hotel businesses and 400,000 in the retail automobile business.

I believe the amendment can be adopted without injury to the eventual success of the bill.

Mr. President, I particularly wish to yield 10 minutes to the able Senator from Florida [Mr. SMATHERS].

Mr. SMATHERS. I thank the Senator from New Mexico. I shall not take 10 minutes.

I agree with everything the Senator from New Mexico has said, with particular emphasis on the hotel, motel, and restaurant industry. I do not believe it is practical to apply the minimum wage rule to an industry which is different from any other industry, as we consider the term "industry."

To begin with, 75 percent of the hotel industry is comprised of small hotels, those having fewer than 125 rooms, the average number of rooms being about 60. We are all aware of the big hotels; but definitely the hotel industry throughout the country is, in essence, comprised of small hotels.

At the same time, the hotel industry has the highest payroll costs for laboring people of any industry, because of every dollar which is spent in the operation of a hotel, 42 percent is for the payment of wages to the employees of the hotel.

The hotel industry has more marginal workers than any other industry. They include potato peelers, maids, elevator operators, busboys, and similar employees. Hotels employ probably the largest number of unskilled workers or marginal workers of any industry. The hotel industry is completely different from the ordinary industry.

In addition, a hotel is operated 24 hours a day. It must maintain double elevators shifts and be ready to operate the elevators whether anyone uses them or not. It is necessary to operate the telephone switchboard on a 24-hour basis. It is necessary to keep the hotel lights burning at all times and to keep all other facilities ready for operation, whether the people are actually using them or not.

It is necessary to maintain a full staff of employees whether the hotel is 25 percent, 65 percent, or 95 percent occupied. Hotel earnings today have reached a 19-year low. Their ratio-to-property value is the lowest since 1941. Room occupancy has declined from 92 percent in 1946 to 67 percent in 1959.

Mr. SALTONSTALL. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. SMATHERS. I yield.

Mr. SALTONSTALL. As I understand, the Senator's amendment includes restaurants and quick-lunch counters. What would be the effect if a company operated quick-lunch counters in more than one State?

Mr. SMATHERS. They would be exempt. The amendment has nothing to do with operations in one State. It exempts from coverage all employees of hotels, motels, and restaurants whether operating in one or more States.

Mr. SALTONSTALL. In other words, hotel employees, restaurant employees, quick-lunch employees, and automobile salesmen are all removed from the bill?

Mr. SMATHERS. They are excluded by this amendment, on the basis that those operations are different from the operations of ordinary industries.

I may go further and may point out that, as a matter of fact, today the hotel industry is a very sick industry.

I wish to state, for the record, that in the Washington Post of June 24 of this year there appeared an article which stated that the hotel earnings ratio had reached a 19-year low. The article pointed out that the earnings of hotels had then reached the lowest point since 1941.

I refer also to an exhibit in regard to the occupancy of hotels. From the exhibit we find that in 1946 the average occupancy of hotels was 92 percent, but that the percentage has been decreasing; and in 1959 it was down to 67 percent, overall.

This industry is a sick one. So, Mr. President, if we require the hotel industry to raise its prices just a little, the effect on the hotels may be disastrous, for people generally are able to go elsewhere, such as boardinghouses or with relatives or friends. They also might choose to drive all night, and not stay in any hotel. This would be the result if the industry is required to pay time and one-half pay for all work over 8 hours a day or payment of a wage which the hotels cannot afford to pay. Many of the small hotels would be sold to larger hotels, and that would result in the concentration which we Democrats continually seek to prevent in the business community. Under those conditions, many of the small hotels would be forced into the hands of a few large hotel corporations; and in that event the large hotel corporations would be encouraged to expand, rather than curtail, their operations. If we make it impossible for the owner of a small hotel to operate it, he will virtually have to sell his hotel to a large hotel corporation or go out of business entirely. This would create and increase unemployment in the community.

Hotels probably engage more unskilled and marginal workers than any other industry. Included in this category are elevator operators, porters, dishwashers, potato peelers, maids, and others. If they are required to pay an increased hourly rate of $1 to $1.25 under the bill to these employees, they would be obliged to mechanize many operations and discharge these employees or recruit employees with a higher level of ability. The same squeeze would occur on housewives, students, and similar types of workers who seek only seasonal employment.

So if this measure is applied to hotels, it will result in a considerable loss of jobs and in concentration of the ownership of hotels into the hands of only a few large hotel corporations.

Therefore, Mr. President, I like to think that the amendment which the Senator from New Mexico and the Senator from Florida have joined in offering is justified. Businesses in this area—the hotels, motels, and restaurants—are engaged in operations very different and distinct from those of the textile industry, which has been referred to by the Senator from Maine and the Senator from Connecticut. Those differences are so considerable, that the restaurants, motels, and the hotels should not be placed under the provisions of the pending measure.

Mr. LAUSCHE. Mr. President, will the Senator from Florida yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. BURDICK in the chair). Does the Senator from Florida yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. SMATHERS. I yield.

Mr. LAUSCHE. Will the amendment exempt from the application of the law all hotels, all motels, and all restaurants?

Mr. SMATHERS. That is correct. The amendment is intended to do that; yes.

Mr. LAUSCHE. That would mean that the Statler Hotel Corp., even if it does a $50 million volume of business and even if it does business in 20 States, would be exempt?

Mr. SMATHERS. The Senator is correct.

Mr. LAUSCHE. And the exemption would also apply to restaurants which do $50 million worth of business; they also would be exempt, would they?

Mr. SMATHERS. The Senator is correct.

Mr. LAUSCHE. How can I justify voting for such an exemption, and yet reconcile my thinking with the arguments which were made for one whole week—namely, that all $1 million businesses should be covered by the law? I simply cannot reconcile my thinking to it.

Mr. SMATHERS. That is perfectly agreeable to the Senator from Florida. I did not expect my good friend, the Senator from Ohio, to reconcile his thinking to mine, at the start.

I merely say I think all of us understand the amendment. The Senator from Ohio does not have to vote for it. I am trying to demonstrate that this business is completely different from ordinary industry. If the Senator from Ohio thinks that is not so, of course he is privileged to vote against the amendment.

Mr. LAUSCHE. Is this the amendment which the Senator from Oregon stated would be offered as a compromise, in order to bring about the defeat of the Monroney amendment?

Mr. SMATHERS. I was not then on the floor, so I do not know. But I doubt it.

Mr. KEATING. Mr. President, will the Senator from Florida yield?

Mr. SMATHERS. I yield.

Mr. KEATING. Mr. President, it is likely that the point I have in mind has already been covered. However, inasmuch as the Senator from Florida has taken a great deal of interest in this legislation, perhaps he can clarify my thinking on one point. I have taken a particular interest in the hotel industry and in automobile salesmen and mechanics, because I feel that there is a difference in kind between those two industries and a great many others.

First, let me ask the following question regarding hotels: As I understand it, under the original bill tipped employees are already excluded. Is that correct?

Mr. SMATHERS. I am informed that the Senator is correct.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time yielded to the Senator from Florida has expired.

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. President, I am happy to yield 5 additional minutes to the Senator from Florida.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Florida is recognized for 5 additional minutes.

Mr. SMATHERS. Then I yield further to the Senator from New York.

Mr. KEATING. I thank the Senator. I shall try to be brief in asking my questions.

The pending amendment would exempt hotel employees whose main income does not come from tips—in other words, chiefly chambermaids, busboys, clerks, and so forth?

Mr. SMATHERS. The Senator is correct, although there is some doubt as to whether chambermaids' pay comes from tips. Of course, in New York, where the people are very generous, and always leave $2 under the pillow, for the chambermaid, the chambermaids doubtless do receive a certain amount of their pay from tips. Certainly, we do not wish to discriminate against chambermaids.

Mr. KEATING. Certainly, we do not; and we do not wish to do anything to discourage the efforts of New Yorkers or Floridians to be kind and generous to all employees.

However, this amendment, as I understand it, would wholly exempt all hotel employees. Is that correct?

Mr. SMATHERS. That is correct.

Mr. KEATING. And also all employees of restaurants?

Mr. SMATHERS. That is correct and employees of motels.

Mr. KEATING. Now as to automobile sales organizations, am I correct that salesmen are already exempted? As I understand it, they were exempted under the provisions of the original bill.

Mr. SMATHERS. That is true.

Mr. KEATING. Now let us consider mechanics who work in the repair shops of automobile sales agencies. They often have to work long and irregular hours. As I read this amendment, mechanics would also be exempted from the requirements of the law, or at least from the overtime requirements. Am I correct in this respect?

Mr. SMATHERS. The Senator is correct. Employees of retail auto dealers would be exempt from minimum wage and overtime provisions.

Mr. KEATING. As far as the hourly level of the minimum wage is concerned, I imagine there is hardly a repair shop in which the minimum hourly wage is not now paid.

Mr. SMATHERS. I agree with the Senator from New York. I am sure that when he takes his automobile to a garage, he is appalled at the size of the bill. But if he complains about it, I am sure he is told that the mechanic is paid $2 an hour and that the pay schedule is displayed on the wall.

Mr. KEATING. I think that is true. I cannot imagine that they would work for $1 an hour or less.

But the difficulty, as regards those who repair automobiles and are employed as part of an automobile sales agency, has been that they work odd hours in order to get their work done. Obviously, if a company is required to pay time and one-half pay for extra hours worked, the result will be much larger repair bills for those whose automobiles they repair.

It seems to me that in such instances the bill, as it originally was reported to us, might have a very seriously inflationary impact.

Mr. SMATHERS. The Senator is correct.

Mr. KEATING. Therefore, as I understand this amendment, it is designed to take care specifically of the several situations to which I have just referred.

Mr. SMATHERS. The Senator is absolutely correct.

Mr. KEATING. I thank the Senator. I agree with this amendment and will support it.

Mr. ALLOTT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. SMATHERS. I yield to the Senator from Colorado.

Mr. ALLOTT. The Senator has just answered the question of the Senator from New York by saying he agreed with the Senator. In the Senator's opinion, does it exempt them from the wage provision as well as the hours provision?

Mr. SMATHERS. It does, in my opinion.

Mr. ALLOTT. All through the Midwest and the West, or the West at least, it is pretty common for an automobile dealer to have, in conjunction with his business, a line of implements of one kind or another. In the opinion of the Senator from Florida, since these people have to work on those implements at all odd hours of the weekend or night, is the amendment broad enough to include implement or combined automobile and implement dealers?

Mr. SMATHERS. Speaking only for myself, I had not actually believed that the amendment would be so broad as to cover a combined operation which would include a farm implement retail sales operation.

Mr. ALLOTT. Then I presume the Senator's answer would be the same, of course; that it would not cover an implement dealer who deals solely in implements?

Mr. SMATHERS. The Senator is expressing what I am endeavoring to say better than I have said it. The amendment would not cover that type of situation.

Mr. KERR. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. SMATHERS. I yield.

Mr. KERR. Would it be possible for the Senator to give consideration to including the farm implement dealer in his amendment?

Mr. SMATHERS. Frankly, I would be delighted to do it. The Senator from New Mexico [Mr. ANDERSON] is also a coauthor of this amendment, and he should be consulted. Actually, I think it would not amount to the exclusion of very many employees.

I should like to call to the attention of the Senator from New Mexico that the question has been raised as to whether or not there would be any objection in our amendment to excluding employees of retail automobile dealers who also handle retail sales of farm machinery or implements.

Mr. KERR. "Either or."

Mr. ANDERSON. I would say to the Senator from Florida and the Senator from Oklahoma that if all categories and classes are to be brought into the bill, I think the Senator to whom they should address the question is the Senator in charge of the bill.

When I discussed this matter with the Senator from Florida I was trying to make sure that the regular, ordinary automobile dealers were exempted from the overtime provisions of the act, and also that hotels, motels, and restaurants were exempted completely from the provisions of the act; but I had not thought about the automobile dealer who handled farm machinery.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time of the Senator has expired.

Mr. ANDERSON. I yield myself 5 minutes.

Therefore, we did not have in mind that dealers who handled automobiles and who also handled gasoline, for example, should be exempt. The able Senator from Rhode Island points out that many of them have hardware stores and automobile supply stores which they operate.

I would, therefore, say the best thing to do is leave it as it is, and if there is a specific desire to cover another category, a Senator should offer a specific amendment.

Mr. KERR. I asked the sponsors of the amendment if they would extend their amendment to include farm machinery also.

Mr. ANDERSON. Fifty percent of the sponsors would not. I do not know whether the Senator from Florida would.

Mr. SMATHERS. We are at a stalemate. I think a specific amendment ought to be offered to that effect, although we are extremely sympathetic to such an amendment.

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. President, I modify my amendment, on page 23, line 2, so the text will read, at the beginning of the last paragraph, "11" in place of "16."

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, reserving the right to object, I think the yeas and nays have been ordered, and it requires unanimous consent to modify the amendment. I should like to be satisfied that I approve it before I can agree; and if I cannot agree, I would be constrained to object.

Mr. SMATHERS. Mr. President, do I still have the floor? If so, I should like to yield to the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. DODD] for a question.

Mr. DODD. Maybe the question has already been answered. Can the Senator tell me approximately how many people would be affected if this amendment were adopted? How many would be left out?

Mr. SMATHERS. The estimate is 867,000. Less than 1 million would be affected by it.

Mr. DODD. I thank the Senator.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time of the Senator has again expired.

Mr. SMATHERS. I suggest we vote.

Mr. ALLOTT. Mr. President, if the time has expired, I offer an amendment.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry. We are proceeding on an objection to modifying the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from New Mexico for a modification?

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, under the circumstances, since this matter has been fully discussed before the committee, and it was certainly our disposition with respect to automobile dealers and salesmen that they be exempt, not only with respect to section 6, dealing with wages, but also with respect to section 7, dealing with hours and also overtime, and inasmuch as such a measure would have to be offered separately, I would much prefer to see it remain in this amendment before we vote on it, and therefore I would have to object.

SEVERAL SENATORS. Vote! Vote!

Mr. ALLOTT. Mr. President, has all time been yielded back?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New Mexico has control of the time.

Mr. ANDERSON. If the Senator from Illinois wants to yield back his time, I am happy to yield back mine.

Mr. DIRKSEN. I have no objection.

Mr. ANDERSON. If the Senator is willing to yield back his time, so am I.

Mr. DIRKSEN. I control the time only if the majority leader favors the amendment.

Mr. ANDERSON. He does.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Then I would control the time.

Mr. ALLOTT. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will state it.

Mr. ALLOTT. Does the time limitation include amendments to amendments as well? In other words, if I desire, as I do desire, to offer an amendment to the pending amendment, which is a very small amendment, would that be included in the total time, or would it have separate time?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It would be included in the time, and would not be regarded as a separate amendment, under the unanimous-consent agreement.

Mr. ALLOTT. It would be included in the time?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Yes.

Mr. ALLOTT. Under those circumstances I desire to make another parliamentary inquiry. Would I have the right to offer this amendment during the time the pending amendment is being considered?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the amendment being offered? The Chair hears none.

Mr. ALLOTT. Mr. President, I offer the amendment which I send to the desk and ask to have stated.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. It is proposed, after the word "trucks" to insert "or farm implements."

Mr. SMATHERS. Mr. President, may I respond to the able Senator from Colorado by saying that one-half of the cosponsors—or two-thirds—happily accept the amendment which he has offered.

Mr. ALLOTT. I appreciate that very much.

Mr. SALTONSTALL. Mr. President, I would appreciate it very much if the Senator from Florida, the Senator from New Mexico, or the Senator from South Carolina would explain the amendment, as to what we shall be voting on, after the changes and so on, particularly with respect to automobiles.

Mr. ANDERSON. We shall be voting on the amendment offered by the Senator from Colorado first.

Mr. SALTONSTALL. I refer to all of the amendment.

Mr. SMATHERS. Mr. President, if the Senator from New Mexico does not wish to do so, I shall endeavor to answer. We merely hope by the amendment to exclude from the provisions of the minimum wage law the hotel employees, the motel employees, the restaurant employees, plus the employees of automobile retail dealers and, with the amendment of the able Senator from Colorado, those automobile dealers who also run farm implement operations in connection therewith.

Mr. SALTONSTALL. That is a complete exemption?

Mr. SMATHERS. A complete exemption.

Mr. SALTONSTALL. For overtime and everything?

Mr. SMATHERS. The Senator is correct. It is very simple.

Mr. PASTORE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. SMATHERS. I am happy to yield.

Mr. PASTORE. In other words, if a man deals solely in farm implements he is not included in the amendment?

Mr. SMATHERS. The Senator is correct.

Mr. PASTORE. The man must be an automobile dealer who sells farm implements as well?

Mr. SMATHERS. Well——

Mr. PASTORE. Wait a minute; that is the explanation given.

Mr. SMATHERS. The intention of the original amendment, of course, was to exclude retail automobile dealers.

Mr. PASTORE. I realize that.

Mr. SMATHERS. We have an amendment which says "and farm implement dealers."

Mr. ALLOTT. "Or farm implement dealers."

Mr. SMATHERS. "Or farm implement dealers."

I would correct my explanation to the Senator from Massachusetts a moment ago and say that, by virtue of the amendment offered by the Senator from Colorado, we would now be excluding retail farm implement dealers, whether they operate in conjunction with an automobile retail dealership or not.

Mr. PASTORE. I should like to ask a further question. If a man runs a hardware store where he sells grass seed but he also sells implements as well—screwdrivers and hammers and saws—is he to be included in this because he sells farm implements?

Mr. ALLOTT. I wish the Senator would direct the question to the Senator from Florida.

Mr. PASTORE. It is the amendment of the Senator from Colorado.

Mr. ALLOTT. Very well. I will answer the question. As I read the original amendment, if it is a part of his business, yes, he would be excluded; and if my language is accepted, yes, he would be excluded, if it were a part of his business. I believe that would be true.

Mr. HUMPHREY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. ALLOTT. I yield.

Mr. HUMPHREY. Would the Senator's amendment mean that if anyone who is engaged in a business which is currently covered by the Fair Labor Standards Act, or which will be covered by the act, can get a franchise to sell farm implements, he would be automatically excluded?

Mr. PASTORE. That is just what I contend.

Mr. HUMPHREY. I must say that this opens up a Pandora's box of trouble. It is entirely probable that in many of these areas with a very limited amount of inventory of farm implements one could be excluded from the provisions of the act.

Mr. ALLOTT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HUMPHREY. I yield.

Mr. ALLOTT. One cannot have a limited inventory of farm implements.

Mr. HUMPHREY. I will say to the Senator, some of us are familiar with inventories of farm implements.

Mr. ALLOTT. I know. Some of the rest of us are, also.

Mr. HUMPHREY. How big an inventory of farm implements does a man have to have?

Mr. ALLOTT. Not more than a hoe, I guess.

Mr. HUMPHREY. That is correct.

Mr. ALLOTT. Mr. President——

Mr. LONG of Louisiana. The regular order, Mr. President.

Mr. SMATHERS. Mr. President, I wish to state to the Senators who have, I think, legitimate questions arising in their minds as to exactly what is meant by "farm implements," as to how far it goes and whether it includes a hoe or a pocketknife, or something else, that I think when we get the bill to conference this definition will be limited, and there will be some more restrictive definition given to the term "farm implements."

The real purpose and the real intent of the amendment offered by the Senator from Colorado, if it should be agreed to, could be made workable as a practical matter. I think that can be done in the conference.

Mr. LONG of Louisiana. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. SMATHERS. I yield to the Senator from New Mexico.

Mr. ANDERSON. The able Senator from Colorado made a suggestion. I think if the Senator would modify his amendment to read "or solely farm implements," the point raised by the able Senator from Rhode Island would be covered. I ask the Senator from Colorado if he is willing to so modify his amendment, to read "or solely farm implements"?

Mr. ALLOTT. I shall be happy to do so.

I have been acting under some limitation in this regard, Mr. President, because I could not get a copy of the amendment. The same words should be inserted at the end of the paragraph, after "automotive," also.

Mr. President, I am happy to accept that modification.

I will say to my friend from Minnesota and other Senators, I am sure the Senator has in mind a similar situation, with lots of dealers in automobiles who handle farm implements. There are many farm implement people who must have mechanics on duty all hours of the night, on Saturdays and Sundays, and every other day. They have a tremendous job to face what the Congress is asked to legislate upon.

Mr. HUMPHREY. The thing which worried me was the size of the farm in Rhode Island, for instance, as compared to the size of the farm in Colorado or in Minnesota, which might have something to do with the size of the inventory of farm implements.

Mr. ALLOTT. It would, indeed.

Mr. BUSH. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. ALLOTT. I do not have the floor.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, I ask for recognition.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Illinois is recognized.

Mr. DIRKSEN. I yield to the distinguished Senator from Connecticut.

Mr. BUSH. I wished to ask a question of the sponsor of the bill. How many additional employees would be excluded under the modification?

Mr. SMATHERS. We had 867,000 exempted. We are going to estimate this will make it 913,000.

Mr. BUSH. I wonder how reliable the Senator's last estimate is.

Mr. SMATHERS. It is about as reliable, I suppose, as some of these other estimates and "guesstimates."

Mr. BUSH. The Senator is not prepared to underwrite it?

Mr. SMATHERS. No, not at this particular moment. I am not quite sure. I would not imagine this would cover a great number. We have to use the ordinary intelligence and understanding of the ordinary Senator in this regard.

Mr. BUSH. Mr. President, I wish to observe that I call this trading on the Senate floor rather than legislating on the Senate floor. I do not think that is a good practice.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time of the Senator has expired.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will state it.

Mr. DIRKSEN. How much time remains for the opponents and the proponents?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time of the Senator from New Mexico has expired. No opposition time has been used.

Mr. DIRKSEN. No opposition time has been used.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Colorado.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, I must first yield back the time. If the majority leader is in favor of the amendment the time would ordinarily come under the control of the minority.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment, as modified, offered by the Senator from Colorado.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Very well. We have no objection to it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment, as modified, offered by the Senator from Colorado. [Putting the question.]

The amendment, as modified, was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Thirty minutes time remain, controlled by the Senator from Illinois.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, the vote now recurs on the Anderson amendment, as amended by the Allott amendment, as modified, which includes, among other things, those who are engaged solely in the farm implement business?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator is correct.

Mr. DIRKSEN. I understand that the proponents are prepared to yield back their time. I understand the yeas and nays have been ordered.

Mr. STENNIS. A point of order, Mr. President.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will state it.

Mr. STENNIS. May we hear what the speaker said? Conditions were such that we could not hear.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, we are prepared to vote. I was only trying to get the parliamentary situation in context. I understand the Senate is about to vote on the amendment of the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. ANDERSON] as amended by the amendment of the Senator from Colorado [Mr. ALLOTT], which inserts in the automotive section of this amendment the words "those engaged solely in the farm implement business."

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. President, I have yielded back the remainder of my time.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, I have yielded back my time. We are prepared to vote.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from New Mexico, as amended. On this question the yeas and nays have been ordered. All time has been yielded back. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk called the roll.

Mr. MANSFIELD. I announce that the Senator from Nevada [Mr. CANNON], the Senator from Georgia [Mr. RUSSELL], and the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. WILLIAMS] are absent on official business.

I also announce that the Senator from Missouri [Mr. HENNINGS] is absent because of illness.

I further announce that, if present and voting, the Senator from Nevada [Mr. CANNON], the Senator from Missouri [Mr. HENNINGS], the Senator from Georgia [Mr. RUSSELL], and the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. WILLIAMS] would each vote "yea."

Mr. KUCHEL. I announce that the Senator from Iowa [Mr. MARTIN] is absent by leave of the Senate on official business.

The result was announced—yeas 87, nays 8, not voting 5, as follows:

So Mr. ANDERSON'S amendment, as amended, was agreed to.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, I move to reconsider the vote by which the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I move to lay that motion on the table.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill is open to further amendment.

Mr. KEFAUVER. Mr. President, I offer an amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. On page 4, line 15, after the word "enterprise," it is proposed to insert the words "in any one State."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Tennessee.

Mr. KEFAUVER. The amendment applies to laundries which are located on or near a State line and which do some business in both States. Under the provisions of the bill, if such a laundry does a million dollars worth of business, it comes under the terms of the proposed Act.

There are a few laundries located in cities near State lines which do business in both States. If their total business is $1 million, under the present provision of the bill they are covered.

The amendment would provide that their total business had to be $1 million in any one State before they would be covered. For example, if a laundry in Memphis did $900,000 worth of business in Tennessee and $200,000 worth of business in Arkansas, it would be covered under the provisions of the pending bill. My amendment would require that the laundry do a million dollars worth of business or more in one State before it would be covered under provisions of the bill.

I believe that laundries are going to have difficulties under the bill. Not many of them would do business in several States. Therefore I hope the sponsor of the bill will accept the amendment.

Mr. McCLELLAN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. KEFAUVER. I yield.

Mr. McCLELLAN. I am not sure that I understand what the Senator's amendment would do. The Senator has referred to my State. Memphis, in the Senator's State, is across the river from West Memphis, Ark. Do I understand that if a laundry located in Memphis does a million dollars worth of business, and a part of the business comes from West Memphis, Ark., it would not be covered?

Mr. KEFAUVER. That is correct. If the Memphis laundry did $900,000 worth of business in Memphis, and at its branch in Arkansas it did a business of $200,000——

Mr. McCLELLAN. It must have a branch?

Mr. KEFAUVER. A branch; or if it does business across the river in Arkansas.

Mr. McCLELLAN. What I am trying to understand is this: Suppose the laundry does $100,000 worth of business in West Memphis, and a million dollars worth of business in Memphis. What impact would the Senator's amendment have on that business?

Mr. KEFAUVER. Then that places them under the act.

Mr. McCLELLAN. It applies to a business whether in West Memphis or not. People can send laundry from Memphis to West Memphis.

Mr. KEFAUVER. Or if they come over to Arkansas and take it to a laundry, or have it sent there, they would come under the act.

Mr. McCLELLAN. What about a store? Suppose a company has a store in Memphis. I am trying to understand the principle we are asked to follow. I do not know that I have any objection. I am trying to understand the principle. Upon what principle do we premise the exemption and remove from coverage?

Mr. KEFAUVER. In the first place, I think laundries, by reason of the nature of their employment, are in competition with householders who do the laundry at home. We know that laundries employ a great many people who could get employment otherwise.

Mr. McCLELLAN. What does the Senator mean by his statement that laundries are in competition with people who do laundry at home?

Mr. KEFAUVER. I mean that if the price goes up too much, the people will do their laundry at home or at places where they can put a quarter in a machine—an automatic machine laundry.

Amendments of other Senators have dealt with other types of business. I am offering this amendment because I think a hardship will be worked on laundries which do a part of their business in one State and a part in another State. They have to be included to make up their million dollars.

Mr. McCLELLAN. I do not believe I have any objection to the amendment. I am simply trying to understand the amendment. I understand that a laundry in Memphis, Tenn., under the terms of the amendment, if adopted, doing $900,000 worth of business in Memphis only, with no business coming from across the State line, would not be covered.

Mr. KEFAUVER. Under the terms of the amendment, it would not be covered.

Mr. McCLELLAN. It would not be covered up to $1 million.

Mr. KEFAUVER. That is correct.

Mr. McCLELLAN. But if it does any business across the State line, then it would be covered?

Mr. KEFAUVER. No. If the business across the State line is added to the business in Memphis, which brings the total amount of business to more than $1 million, the company would be covered.

Mr. McCLELLAN. It could operate in both States until the business reached $1 million?

Mr. KEFAUVER. That is correct.

Mr. McCLELLAN. That would be the cutoff. What change does it make in the bill which the bill does not provide for now?

Mr. KEFAUVER. What it does to the bill is that if a laundry in Memphis does business of $900,000-plus in that city, and does $200,000 of business in a branch in Arkansas, then, under the bill, it would be covered. Under my amendment, it would not be covered unless the amount in either State—in one State—was more than $1 million.

Mr. McCLELLAN. Then, if a Memphis laundry has a branch laundry in Arkansas which does $250,000 worth of business, and the parent plant in Memphis does $900,000 worth of business, the total amount being $1,150,000, neither plant would be covered. Is that correct?

Mr. KEFAUVER. That is correct.

Mr. McCLELLAN. I think that is all right. I am not complaining. But I think since we are legislating now to give distinction and recognition to the unit—what the unit produces in Memphis and what the unit produces in Arkansas in revenue, then we ought to take into account many other small establishments in small towns which are now covered by the $1 million provision of the bill.

They ought to be dealt with equitably and ought to have the amount reduced to $250,000 per plant or per establishment.

As it is now, a little store may be doing only $250,000 worth of business in West Memphis, but if in some other place it does $900,000 worth of business, it has to pay in both places.

I think the amendment is all right. I think individual plants which are located in a community have to be sustained by the economy of the community. They must be sustained by protection. Otherwise, they will be driven out.

It may be said that they are operated by rich persons. That may be so, but they provide a necessary service for the people of the community.

I shall vote for the amendment. Then I shall offer an amendment to protect other businesses—service establishments, and mercantile establishments—in the same manner. I think the amendment is satisfactory. I shall support it. But I shall do so on the basis that we must be fair and equitable and not single out laundries and not grant the same consideration to a retail establishment.

Mr. HUMPHREY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. KEFAUVER. I yield.

Mr. HUMPHREY. As I understand the proposal of the Senator from Arkansas, he would not amend the bill by his suggestion here that each establishment would have only $1 million for exemptions. The Senator was making the suggestion that there be a $250,000 floor, so to speak. There is a great difference between that and the amendment of the Senator from Tennessee, which provides that there be a $1 million exemption on an enterprise basis, applied on the unit basis. That is what the Senator from Tennessee is saying. He is saying that as to each unit, up to $1 million, there shall be an exemption, in the instance of a laundry.

Mr. KEFAUVER. Yes.

Mr. HUMPHREY. The Senator from Arkansas is saying that he agrees with the principle of the unit exemption.

Mr. KEFAUVER. Yes.

Mr. McCLELLAN. Yes.

Mr. HUMPHREY. As I understood the Senator from Arkansas, he said the exemption would be up to $250,000.

Mr. McCLELLAN. As to retail establishments, just as there is for service establishments in the bill now.

Mr. HUMPHREY. Yes; but there is a $750,000 difference, and that is substantial.

Mr. McCLELLAN. I understand it is; but the principle is the same.

Mr. HUMPHREY. The difference affects thousands and thousands of workers.

Mr. McCLELLAN. I thought we would apply the same principle to all workers. I did not know there was any wish to differentiate in principle.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. KEFAUVER. I yield.

Mr. SPARKMAN. I invite the attention of the Senator from Arkansas. Perhaps I do not understand this subject, but it seems to me that the effect of the amendment would be that a laundry that operates in Little Rock, Ark., and does business amounting to $1,250,000 annually—I shall use that figure for the sake of argument—would be subject to the amendment.

But a laundry operating in Memphis, and doing $1,250,000, $300,000 of which was done across the river, would be exempt. It seems to me that that would be discriminatory against laundry establishments located within one State. I think that angle ought to be considered.

Mr. McCLELLAN. But it does preserve the principle of applying it to a unit.

Mr. SPARKMAN. It may do that. However, at the same time, it violates the principle upon which the Wage and Hour Act was originally based, namely, the principle of interstate commerce. It is interstate commerce when the business moves across a State line. Interstate commerce is being favored to a greater extent than wholly intrastate business. I think that angle should be considered.

Mr. HUMPHREY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. KEFAUVER. I yield.

Mr. HUMPHREY. The point the Senator from Arkansas makes is related to units of enterprise within a State.

Mr. McCLELLAN. That is correct.

Mr. HUMPHREY. The point of the Senator from Tennessee is related to units of enterprise which may operate between States. One of them is interstate, according to the constitutional principle; the other is intrastate in nature.

Mr. McCLELLAN. Yes. I do not see why we should legislate to favor interstate business and give it exemptions, and not provide the same exemptions for intrastate business.

Mr. HUMPHREY. The Senator from Tennessee, I know, has good reason for offering his amendment; otherwise, he certainly would not be doing so. Nevertheless, I think we ought clearly to understand that this proposal is a reversal of the principle upon which the Fair Labor Standards Act has been predicated, namely, the commerce clause.

The Senator from Arkansas relates it to the principle advanced by the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. MONRONEY], intrastate business, on the basis of units of enterprise which might have several units.

Mr. McCLELLAN. I take the position that if we are to act on behalf of interstate business, certainly we ought to make the same provision for intrastate business operating smaller enterprises.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. I would say that even if we do not do this for intrastate businesses, we should do it for the small units which do business at the level of $250,000—businesses which at least in Arkansas, are very small; and I imagine the same is true of such businesses in other States. They are both intrastate businesses and very small businesses, and certainly they should be given consideration.

So I hope we agree to an amendment which will provide for a $250,000 limit.

Mr. HUMPHREY. It seems to me that is a very sensible proposal, both on the basis of the constitutionality of the provisions of the Fair Labor Standards Act and on the basis of simple equity.

Mr. KEFAUVER. Mr. President, the laundries have a difficult time, as the situation now stands. This amendment provides us with an opportunity to decrease slightly the impact on certain laundries in certain situations.

Mr. President, I yield back the remainder of the time under my control.

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, if the Senator from Illinois will yield to me——

Mr. DIRKSEN. I yield.

Mr. MORSE. I should like to address myself to the amendment. I believe the amendment is both very unsound and very unfortunate. The amendment runs counter to many of the principles of the bill. I am at a loss to understand why the amendment has been submitted.

First of all, from the standpoint of the workers concerned, I cannot understand why the amendment has been submitted. In this case we are dealing with some of the lowest paid workers in the Nation. Yet, Mr. President, instead of calling for better treatment of those employees, the amendment of the Senator from Tennessee would result in even greater exploitation of these very poorly paid employees, many of whom receive from 50 cents to 60 cents an hour.

When I hear the Senator from Tennessee say that the laundries are in a bad plight, I point out that the laundry workers are in a much worse plight.

I should like to direct attention to the plight of these workers, rather than to the claims of the laundry operators that their laundries should be exempted from the application of this law and that they should not be required to pay decent wages. I am surprised that the Senator from Tennessee would support such an amendment, which would prevent the doing of simple justice and equity to this group of workers which is more greatly exploited than is any other group of workers in the Nation.

Furthermore, as was pointed out by the Senator from Arkansas, when we consider the hypothetical cases I asked the Senator from Tennessee about, the injustice of the amendment becomes all the more apparent. For instance, if laundry A, in Memphis, Tenn., does $900,000 worth of business which it receives from customers in Memphis, Tenn., and also does $100,000 worth of business which it receives from customers located in West Memphis, Ark., under the bill as it now stands that laundry would be covered; but under the amendment of the Senator from Tennessee, that laundry would not be covered.

On the other hand, laundry B, in West Memphis, Ark., doing $1,200,000 worth of business, would be covered; and laundry C, in Memphis, Tenn., and doing a business of $1,500,000, would be covered.

So the Senator from Tennessee proposes that laundry A be exempt, and thus be given a competitive advantage over laundries B and C. Mr. President, it would be grossly discriminatory to do so; it would be grossly discriminatory both as to the employers involved and as to the employees involved.

We should give careful consideration to the situation of the workers themselves. The workers in laundry A are working for an employer who does $1 million worth of business, and certainly they should be covered by this law. That employer should not be exempted simply because $100,000 worth of his business comes from West Memphis, Ark.

In fact, if this amendment is agreed to, such a laundry will merely proceed to obtain more business from West Memphis, because under such circumstances and with such encouragement, that exploiting employer would certainly be able to increase his operations at the expense of the laundries which are covered.

The Senator from Tennessee has said that he wishes to aid competition. But in that case that employer would take unfair advantage of his location close to the State line, and the result of the amendment would be to permit him to continue to exploit his employees by continuing to pay them unfair, inequitable, unreasonably low wages.

So, Mr. President, this amendment is discriminatory and unfair; and it should be rejected.

Mr. KEFAUVER. Mr. President, will the Senator from Oregon yield to me?

Mr. MORSE. I yield.

Mr. KEFAUVER. The Senator should read the provision on page 18. If a laundry in West Memphis were doing a large amount of business, it would be excluded, under the provisions of the bill as it now stands; I think it is fair to state, as an interpretation of that provision on page 18, that if the business of the laundry exceeded $150,000, the laundry would be excluded from the application of this law.

Mr. MORSE. What is the Senator's conclusion?

Mr. KEFAUVER. My conclusion is that a small business which was engaged in operations across a State line would be operating under different circumstances, and should not be covered by the act.

Mr. MORSE. But that would not change at all the effect of the Senator's amendment, on the basis of the three hypothetical cases I asked him about; and that would not change the fact that one of the results of the Senator's amendment—regardless of whether he sought that result—would be the doing of gross injustice to workers who now receive very low pay.

So I cannot possibly consider voting in favor of the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is further time yielded?

Mr. KEFAUVER. Mr. President, I yield back the remainder of the time under my control.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, in the absence of the majority leader, I assume that unless he is opposed to the amendment, I have control of the time in opposition to the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That is correct.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Let me ask whether other Senators wish to have time yielded to them.

Mr. GOLDWATER. Mr. President——

Mr. DIRKSEN. I yield to the Senator from Arizona.

Mr. GOLDWATER. Let me say that I think the Senator from Oregon very ably presented the case. I think he could have made the same argument against the hotel amendment, but he did not. I think he presented his point very well.

Mr. HUMPHREY. Mr. President, I do not think that statement should go uncontested. There is merit to the argument that the same point could have been made against the hotel amendment; but there is also merit to the point that the duty of a legislative body is to legislate, and sometimes compromises are necessary.

I do not think any Senator has to make any apology for his vote on the hotel amendment, other than to point out that it would have been better if we had not had to vote in that way. But we had to make a choice between that amendment and something that was worse.

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, will the Senator from Illinois yield 2 minutes to me?

Mr. DIRKSEN. I yield 2 minutes to the Senator from Oregon.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Oregon is recognized for 2 minutes.

Mr. MORSE. I would say that the Anderson amendment, in its final wording, was unfortunately drawn. I voted for it because if I had voted against it there would have been many who would have remembered when I opposed the Monroney amendment, I said I would subsequently vote for the Anderson amendment. But at the time when I was opposing the Monroney amendment, and stated that subsequently I would vote for the Anderson amendment, the Anderson amendment called for a limitation in regard to application of the overtime pay provisions to the automobile dealers, but not for an exemption in regard to the payment of minimum wages. However, later a change was made. I am advised that an unfortunate error was made.

But when the Senator from New Mexico tried to correct the error, he found that the parliamentary situation was such that unanimous consent would have to be given before the correction could be made. And at that point, instead of being able to obtain unanimous consent, objection was made by another Senator.

Certainly I keep my word. But today, when I argued against the Monroney amendment, I said that if I had to make a compromise in connection with this legislative process, in order to prevent what I am satisfied further study will show to be the case—namely, a most unfortunate principle in the Monroney amendment—I was willing to make that bargain in order to prevent that principle from being enacted into law.

The Senator from New Mexico can verify every word that I say. When we made that proposal, the understanding was that the automobile industry would be excluded only from the overtime provisions, not from the provisions in regard to the minimum wage.

Furthermore, let me point out, in connection with the Senator's argument about hotels, that hotels cannot be moved around in the way that laundry service can. Laundry service can cover a large territory and can cross State lines and the various laundries in the Memphis area compete on both sides of the Mississippi River.

Therefore, I think there is all the difference in the world between the hotel amendment and the so-called laundry amendment which the Senator from Tennessee has submitted.

Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. DIRKSEN. I yield to the Senator from Arizona.

Mr. GOLDWATER. I wanted the Senator from Oregon to understand very clearly I was not doubting his word. I remember his saying he would vote for the Anderson amendment. I must say he made quite a concession, because I listened to the Senator from Oregon say time and again he feels everybody should be covered, and yet he is very willing to exempt every hotel, motel, restaurant, saloon, automobile establishment, and those who sell farm implements in the country.

This is, I must say, quite a concession, and I was very much surprised to find a little inconsistency in his position. When he argued eloquently for the poor workers in the laundries, he forgot about the poor workers who work in the back ends of the hotels. They are very low-paid workers. I did not want the RECORD not to indicate that there was an inconsistency there.

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. DIRKSEN. I yield first to the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. ANDERSON].

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. President, I appreciate the kindness of the able Senator from Illinois. I have just returned from the Office of the Official Reporters, and I find that their record confirms my memory. As I started to explain, I said the amendment applied only to the overtime provisions as far as automobile workers are concerned, and also employees of hotels, motels, and restaurants.

However, there were two texts of the amendment prepared. One was prepared for the primary use of the able Senator from Florida [Mr. SMATHERS], and one which I had hoped to use. Apparently, I got the text designed to go to the Senator from Florida [Mr. SMATHERS] because it included the complete elimination of the automobile workers. Then I tried to correct it.

The Senator from Illinois was completely correct. I had, myself, started the discussion by asking for the yeas and nays, and that prevented my modifying my amendment by mere request; it took unanimous consent. The minority leader was within his rights in objecting. I only point out to him that the amendment, which had been discussed by the Senator from Massachusetts with many Members of the Senate, was designed to cover only the overtime provisions, and the Senator from Massachusetts told many Senators that it would satisfy him——

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. ANDERSON. If the Senator from Illinois will permit me to do so.

Mr. DIRKSEN. If the Senator from New Mexico has completed his statement.

Mr. KENNEDY. Let me say for the RECORD that I informed the Senator from New Mexico I would support an amendment which would strike out hotels, restaurants, and automobiles, as far as overtime is concerned, and I wished they could be in, because, in my judgment, we would protect the bill best by making those agreements. My understanding was that the language would so provide.

When it became obvious that the language was not clear, the Senator from New Mexico attempted to correct it. By then it was too late. I voted "nay" merely to register my opposition to the withdrawal completely of automobiles; but I want to make it clear—and a good many Senators asked me my opinion about it—I said I would vote for the hotels, restaurants, and automobiles, overtime. The part in dispute is automobiles insofar as the minimum that should be in the bill. I shall continue to express my view in conference or anyplace else.

I wanted to say that because the Senator from Oregon and I are in complete agreement as to what should be done, but, unfortunately, when I came back on the floor to vote, I felt I should vote "nay" with respect to the automobile proposition because I could express my view thereafter with more conviction.

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me for a moment?

Mr. DIRKSEN. I yield.

Mr. MORSE. I am sure the Senator from Massachusetts agrees with me that, in view of the statement I made on the floor of the Senate when I was opposing the Monroney amendment, I had a right to consider myself bound to vote for the Anderson amendment, even though a mistake in draftsmanship was made. As the final draft went to the clerk, it could not be corrected before the vote.

Does the Senator agree with me that, so far as my representations were concerned, I followed a course of action which I considered perfectly proper?

Mr. KENNEDY. The Senator from Oregon and I are in complete agreement. The problem was in our understanding of what the amendment would be with respect to hotels, restaurants, and overtime in automobiles. That was the understanding of the Senator from New Mexico. Then when he attempted to make sure, he was unable to do so; and for that reason, because I will be in conference, I thought I should make my position clear. But I do support it, and I want to say to every Senator who voted that way, and who knows my views, it was best suited to protect the bill by voting to take hotels and restaurants out and also to take automobile overtime out. The difference is on a technical question.

Mr. MORSE. I think it is proper that the Senator from Massachusetts and I engage in this colloquy on the floor of the Senate, so nobody can say we were in conflict on the amendment. We were not in conflict. The Senator from Massachusetts followed a course of action which was perfectly proper, because he was not in the same position as the Senator from Oregon. He did not make the same statement the Senator from Oregon made on the floor of the Senate.

Now I want to say to the Senator from Arizona that the Senator from Oregon does not consider himself in the slightest degree in an inconsistent position. I still urge that there be a coverage of all persons that are engaged in activities affecting commerce.

I am a realist in regard to the legislative process. The Senator knows that in committee I had to yield time and time again to concessions in order to get a bill out that had some substance in it. But the Senator from Oregon knows there will be another day and another time, and come next January I shall continue my fight for new legislation for amendments to the Fair Labor Standards Act that will cover a good many people to whom we had to deny coverage in this bill in order to get a bill better than we would have gotten had we adopted the Monroney amendment.

Mr. GOLDWATER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. DIRKSEN. I yield to the Senator from Arizona.

Mr. GOLDWATER. I wish to say to my good friend from Oregon this bill has not yet been put to a third reading. I have quite a pile of amendments here. I certainly welcome the opportunity to offer amendments, and if the Senator from Oregon has any amendments in mind, he still has an opportunity to offer them.

I heard the Senator talk a lot about broadened coverage, but I have not seen any action yet, except that the Hilton, Sheraton, and Statler hotels, some of the greatest enterprises in America, have been taken out from coverage; and may I say I am quite surprised.

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. DIRKSEN. I yield.

Mr. MORSE. I want to put the Senator's mind at rest. I certainly would have lost all good sense if after the votes that have occurred on the floor of the Senate I attempted in this session to still try to broaden the bill as I tried to do in committee. So the Senator is not going to have to hear me argue for the amendments I lost in committee, because I have already lost them by the votes which have been taken. So I shall not offer them.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, I should like to ask my colleague from Arizona whether he has a few amendments or a substantial number, and whether he could indicate for the information of the Senate how many amendments he may propose before action on this bill is concluded.

Mr. GOLDWATER. I could answer the question very easily. I have a good many amendments. I know other Members of the Senate have amendments, and if I could determine how many they had, it would determine how many I would offer. I have not made any determination of that fact. There is an amendment that deals with laundries. A colleague has indicated he has an amendment similar to mine that takes care of workers in amusement and recreation establishments. There may be several coincidences like that. So I could not give the Senator the exact figure.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Would it be as much as a dozen?

Mr. GOLDWATER. Perhaps.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Or a score of amendments?

Mr. GOLDWATER. Perhaps.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. DIRKSEN. I yield.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. I had an amendment, which we were discussing a moment ago, which I intended to offer. It deals with the retail unit store of the $250,000 limit. I hope I may offer it as soon as the pending amendment is disposed of.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will state it.

Mr. DIRKSEN. The pending amendment is the amendment offered by the distinguished Senator from Tennessee [Mr. KEFAUVER] enlarging the scope of one provision on page 17 of the bill, as I understand.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator is correct.

Mr. DIRKSEN. I have only one observation to make, and then I shall yield back my remaining time.

One of the great freedoms is the freedom to make mistakes, freedom to err. That is what Mahatma Gandhi once said about freedom.

A mistake may have been made. Mistakes are always lamentable, but it is easier for truth to result from a mistake than to result from confusion. I felt compelled to object to the modification of the Anderson amendment for the very good reason that we were prepared to offer an amendment on that point relating to automobile dealers. We could telescope the whole proposal into one action, and it would not require any further affirmative effort on our part.

I am sorry if my action was regarded as arbitrary. I do not think so. I regret extremely that the mistake was made, but blessed be the day when truth can result from error, and the Senate can work its will.

Mr. President, if the Senator from Tennessee is prepared to yield back his time, I yield back my time.

Mr. KEFAUVER. Mr. President, I yield back my time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Tennessee.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, what was the ruling of the Presiding Officer?

Mr. DIRKSEN. It has been announced, Mr. President.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, I move to reconsider the vote by which the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, I move to lay that motion on the table.

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The Chief Clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Illinois [Mr. DIRKSEN] to lay on the table the motion of the Senator from Oregon [Mr. MORSE] to reconsider the vote by which the Kefauver amendment was agreed to.

The motion to lay on the table was rejected.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion to reconsider.

The motion to reconsider was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question now is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. KEFAUVER].

The amendment was rejected.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill is open to further amendment.

Mr. GOLDWATER. Mr. President, I was informed that the distinguished junior Senator from Indiana [Mr. HARTKE] desired to offer an amendment.

Mr. HARTKE. The Senator may proceed.

Mr. GOLDWATER. Mr. President, if the Senator from Massachusetts will give me his attention, I wish to offer a very simple amendment.

Mr. President, I call up my amendment, designated "8–17–60—F," and ask that it be stated.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated for the information of the Senate.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 5, line 8, it is proposed to strike the colon and insert the following: ", exclusive of excise taxes at the retail level which are separately stated:".

Mr. GOLDWATER. I say to my friend from Massachusetts that this would merely bring subsection (5) in harmony with (t) (1), (2), and (4) which also exclude excise taxes from the determination of the total gross.

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, I accept the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Arizona.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. Mr. President, I offer the amendment which I send to the desk and ask to have stated.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated for the information of the Senate.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 5, line 17, before the period, it is proposed to insert a comma and the following: "or (in the case of a retail or service establishment or an establishment engaged in laundering, cleaning, or repairing clothing or fabrics) if the annual gross volume of sales of such establishment is less than $250,000, exclusive of excise taxes at the retail level which are separately stated."

Mr. FULBRIGHT. Mr. President, I desire to withdraw the amendment temporarily. I wish to offer it at a later time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment is withdrawn.

REVISION OF BOUNDARIES OF DINOSAUR NATIONAL MONUMENT

The PRESIDING OFFICER laid before the Senate a message from the House of Representatives announcing its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H.R. 6597) to revise the boundaries of Dinosaur National Monument and provide an entrance road or roads thereto, and for other purposes, and requesting a conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon.

Mr. MOSS. I move that the Senate insist upon its amendments, agree to the request of the House for a conference, and that the Chair appoint the conferees on the part of the Senate.

The motion was agreed to; and the Presiding Officer appointed Mr. Moss, Mr. GRUENING, and Mr. ALLOTT conferees on the part of the Senate.

THE ARMS INDUSTRY OF THE UNITED STATES

Mr. DODD. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Connecticut is recognized. Does the Senator ask for time? Time is now controlled.

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Senator from Connecticut may proceed for 5 minutes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Montana? The Chair hears none, and the Senator may proceed.

Mr. DODD. Mr. President, during the past few days there has been a major attempt by obscure and unregistered lobbyists to discredit, through misrepresentation and innuendo, section 107 of the appropriation bill for the Departments of State, Justice, and the Judiciary, a bill which will be in conference next week.

That section reads as follows:

> It is the sense of the Senate that in the administration of section 414 of the Mutual Security Act of 1954, as amended, the Secretary of State should take such action as may be necessary to prevent the importation or reimportation into the United States (other than for use by the Armed Forces of the United States) for resale of firearms manufactured for the armed forces of any country, or parts thereof for reassembly, except those which are curios or antiques or weapons of obsolete ignition incapable of using a fixed cartridge or fixed shotgun shell.

The purpose of this section is to advise the Secretary of State to take action to prevent foreign nations from dumping millions and millions of surplus military rifles on the American market and thus destroying the arms producing industry of the United States.

Members of the Congress in the past week have been flooded with letters protesting against this amendment, letters which were touched off by 20,000 mail-outs from lobbyists of foreign firearms importers. These mail-outs falsely charge that section 107 was "slipped onto" the appropriation bill, and that it is a "vicious attempt by the large arms companies to wreck thousands of small businesses."

The fact is that this amendment was offered by me in committee and I carefully explained it to the committee members. The full text of the amendment was printed in the committee report which was on the desk of every Senator the day the bill was acted upon by the Senate.

The fact is that this amendment will not destroy American businesses. On the contrary, it seeks to save the domestic firearms business from destruction.

Such action would ruin the domestic firearms industry in this country. Would it not be strange for us not to allow our own surplus rifles to be sold in this country, and at the same time to allow millions of surplus rifles to be shipped here to compete with our small but very essential and necessary firearms industry? That is why the amendment was offered. It is not a directive, but a "sense-of-the-Senate" amendment.

The U.S. Government owns many millions of surplus military M–1 rifles. It has not permitted the sale of these rifles on the domestic market. Why? Because such action would ruin the domestic firearms industry, which is rightly considered a vital element of our national defense. How strange, therefore, that the State Department is permitting foreign nations to unload their surplus military weapons here.

Since 1956, the number of surplus rifles imported into the United States has climbed rapidly each year. These imports increased by 20 times between 1955 and 1958 while domestic center fire rifle sales decreased by 50 percent. In 1958, the number of military surplus firearms imported into this country actually exceeded our domestic sales.

It has been estimated that the Soviet Union will dump 10 million surplus arms on the market in the next 2 years and unless we act to prevent it, these rifles could be imported into the United States. Added to the steady flow of surplus firearms imports from England, Italy, Sweden, and Germany, this would cripple our own domestic industry. We cannot allow this to happen.

We are dependent upon our firearms producers to develop new and better weapons in time of peace and to mass produce these weapons in time of national emergency. Does it make sense to permit the ruin of this vital American industry through the importation of vast numbers of foreign surplus military rifles to be sold here at cutrate prices with which neither our firearms industry nor any other firearms industry in the world can compete?

I do not think so. The Appropriations Committee did not think so when it accepted my amendment. The Senate did not think so when it adopted that amendment. And I am confident that the attempts of lobbyists to mislead Members of Congress will not succeed.

Let us take a look at this lobby.

The organization which has sent out the letters to which I refer calls itself the American Council for Technical Products, Inc., and lists its address as 1025 Connecticut Avenue NW. However, it is not listed in the various directories which are available, and its existence is unknown to the management and the occupants of the building at 1025 Connecticut Avenue NW. When this alleged trade association was incorporated in the State of Delaware in 1958, it listed Washington, D.C., as its principal place of business outside of Delaware. Yet it is neither incorporated nor registered in the District of Columbia. Nor has it complied with the District of Columbia law which requires foreign corporations to obtain a certification of authority to transact business in the District of Columbia. Nor is this association registered with the Justice Department as a lobby.

I believe that the misleading letter which the council sent to thousands of small arms merchants constitutes a clear case of lobbying. I intend to bring this matter to the attention of the Attorney General for a judgment upon possible infringement of our existing lobbying registration laws.

This council claims to represent 18 arms importing companies. The fact is that it does not. Of the alleged 18 firms, 5 are owned by 1 corporation; 3 more are owned by a second corporation and another 3 are owned by a third corporation. Not one of the companies represented by the impressive sounding American Council for Technical Products, Inc., either manufactures arms or carries on arms research. All of the officers of this "trade association" are employees of one arms importing company, Interarmco, Ltd.

In contrast to this paper organization which claims to speak for the interests of the small arms merchants of America, I submit to you the names of the real associations which are supporting my amendment and which do in fact represent the legitimate arms merchants of this country: National Wholesale Hardware Association, National Retail Hardware Association, National Sporting Goods Association, National Sporting Goods Jobbers Association, and Southern Wholesale Hardware Association.

And so I hope that no Member of the Congress will be misled by the letters that are flooding in. Section 107 is a sense resolution which does not purport to represent the sentiment of the House of Representatives and which is not binding upon the State Department. It does one thing. It advises the State Department that the U.S. Senate is alarmed over the possible destruction of our domestic arms industry through the importation of surplus military rifles from abroad. It is as simple as that.

I think it is my duty, therefore, to bring the subject to the attention of the Attorney General because I find that the so-called council is not registered as a lobbyist, as it should be, and so it does not represent the companies it purports to represent in the letter which was sent to the thousands of small businessmen who repair guns and have business related to the manufacture of guns. In my State are great arms producing companies like Winchester, Colt, and Remington. This is my interest, of course, I am frank to say. We call on these companies in times of emergencies. If they are to survive, certainly they ought to get some protection against this kind of competition which has been flooding the country.

That was the purpose of the amendment, and I hope no Member of the Congress will be misled by the propaganda which has been circulated and therefore have a wrong opinion of either the purpose of the amendment or the way in which it was proposed.

FAIR LABOR STANDARDS AMENDMENTS OF 1960

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 3758) to amend the Fair Labor Standards Act of 1938, as amended, to provide coverage of employees of large enterprises engaged in retail trade or service and of other employers engaged in activities affecting commerce, to increase the minimum wage under the act to $1.25 an hour, and for other purposes.

Mr. HARTKE. Mr. President, I offer the amendment which I send to the desk and ask to have stated.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment offered by the Senator from Indiana will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 18, line 14 it is proposed to strike the word "or".

On page 18, line 15, before the word "business" it is proposed to insert ", or commercial."

Mr. HARTKE. Mr. President, home laundries and most linen supply companies are now exempt from the pay provisions of the Fair Labor Standards Act provided that 50 percent or more of their receipts are derived from sales made within the State and not more than 25 percent of their annual receipts are derived from sales to customers engaged in a mining, manufacturing, transportation, or communications business. Cleaning and dyeing establishments are exempt under the same provision.

This amendment simply provides that a laundry or linen supply company is covered if 25 percent or more of its annual receipts are derived from sales to customers engaged in a mining, manufacturing, transportation, communications, or commercial business.

This will not hurt those laundries and linen supply companies which serve only homes. However, if they go into the commercial field, and 25 percent or more of their receipts are derived from this business, then they will be covered.

This will equalize competition among those companies engaging in the commercial field, much as we have already equalized competition among those companies servicing mining, manufacturing, transportation, and communications business.

Mr. President, I yield back my remaining time.

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, may we have the amendment reread before we vote?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will reread the amendment.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 18, line 14, it is proposed to strike the word "or". On page 18, line 15, before the word "business" it is proposed to insert ", or commercial".

Mr. KENNEDY. Has time been yielded back on the amendment?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Indiana has yielded back his remaining time.

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. President, the time is divided. While the Senator from Indiana has yielded back his time, at least provisionally, we have not yielded back our time.

Mr. KENNEDY. Does the amendment involve laundries?

Mr. HARTKE. The Senator is correct. The amendment seeks to bring about equalization for those persons who service commercial establishments along with those already covered in the act and who were originally covered by the act.

Mr. KENNEDY. I understand.

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. President, I yield back the remainder of the time on this side.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Indiana. [Putting the question.]

The Chair is in doubt, and orders a division.

On a division, the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. Mr. President, I offer an amendment which I send to the desk and ask to have stated.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment offered by the Senator from Arkansas will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 17, line 20, after the words "except an establishment" it is proposed to insert "which has an annual gross volume of sales of $250,000 or more (exclusive of excise taxes at the retail level, separately stated) and which is".

On page 17, line 21, after the word "section 3(t)(1)" it is proposed to insert a comma.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. Mr. President, I yield myself 5 minutes. This is the amendment which was discussed a moment ago in connection with the amendment of the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. KEFAUVER]. It is confined to retail stores, and it is designed to give relief to the small units of the relatively small chains in my part of the country and adjoining States.

Of course, the overall enterprise may do a million dollars' worth of business, but there would be a number of its individual units which would do much less than that. Some that I know of do in the neighborhood of $150,000 worth of business a year, and some even as little as $80,000. The bill would impose an intolerable burden upon those very small units. I do not believe the amendment would make any great impact on the objectives of the sponsors of the bill. I hope the Senate will adopt it.

I yield 2 minutes to my senior colleague.

Mr. McCLELLAN. Mr. President, I commend my colleague for offering the amendment. I am happy to join him in cosponsoring it. This provision was referred to a while ago in the colloquy with the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. KEFAUVER]. The amendment protects intrastate commerce. Since we are more or less, in my opinion, invading that field and drawing money lines, or a line based on the volume of business, or a revenue line, in order to give some measure of equality to small chainstores in a town, this is the only way we can do that and protect them; otherwise, we will impose a discrimination and hardship on them which should not result. I am supporting the amendment, and I hope it will be adopted.

Mr. HOLLAND. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. FULBRIGHT. I yield.

Mr. HOLLAND. Does not the amendment apply to individual units of small chain groups, which in our part of the country are referred to as variety or "racket" stores?

Mr. FULBRIGHT. That is correct.

Mr. HOLLAND. Such small stores are usually located in county-seat towns, and supply a great variety of small miscellaneous articles, but they do not do a great volume of business. Is that correct?

Mr. FULBRIGHT. The Senator is correct. Many of the small stores come in direct competition with some service stations, which are exempted in other parts of the bill. While they do not duplicate them, they do have some drygoods and accessories that are in competition.

Mr. HOLLAND. Do I correctly understand that the Senator's amendment, if adopted, would bring about a situation in which the kind of organization that I have pictured, whose total business is over a million dollars, but whose individual units do not do $250,000 worth of business, would not be required to comply with the requirement?

Mr. FULBRIGHT. They would not be covered. The purpose of the amendment is to give relief in the kind of situation the Senator has described.

Mr. HOLLAND. Is it not true that a small unit of this kind which would do business of under $250,000 would usually do business in a small county seat town, in which no business in town would do business in sufficient volume to come under the act?

Mr. FULBRIGHT. That is true. I know of such situations, where none of the businesses in the town would come under the act.

Mr. HOLLAND. I thank the Senator. The Senator has offered a realistic amendment, and I will support it.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. I thank the Senator.

Mr. JORDAN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. FULBRIGHT. I yield.

Mr. JORDAN. My distinguished friend from Florida has just brought out one of the points on which I wish to be certain, and that is, that the amendment covers the variety stores, as we call them, which are located usually in small towns, in which Woolworth and Kresge and the other large chainstores could not operate and survive. They usually sell reasonably priced merchandise, and have a hard time staying in business.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. That is correct. They have very small staffs of local people. It is extremely difficult to absorb the cost and the bookkeeping and all the other necessary things that go with this kind of regulation.

Mr. JORDAN. I have personally checked on that type of store. Many of these stores employ handicapped people and young people after school, and those people get employment which they otherwise would not have.

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, we will accept the amendment.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. I thank the Senator.

I yield back the remainder of my time.

Mr. MANSFIELD. I yield back the remainder of my time.

Mr. FULBRIGHT subsequently said: Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have a short statement explaining the amendment I offered, which was agreed to, printed in the RECORD prior to the vote on the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Arkansas?

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

STATEMENT BY SENATOR FULBRIGHT

The amendment which I have offered will do nothing more than provide simple justice to certain small retail outlets.

This bill introduces a new concept into the Government's regulation of retail enterprise. Instead of treating each individual unit of a retail operation as an entity it would lump all the components of an operation together for purposes of coverage of employees under the act. By looking to the overall sales of a retail organization a completely artificial yardstick has been employed for purposes of exemptions from coverage. Under this bill a retail giant such as Macy's or Gimbels is treated the same as a small chain of 10 stores with each grossing $100,000 per year.

This approach completely disregards the realities of retail competition. The management, merchandising, and financial ability of the small retail outlet cannot be logically considered on the same plane as the retail stores doing millions in business each year. My amendment is designed to recognize the conditions as they exist in the retail industry and give a fair break to the small volume stores which are units in a chain operation grossing more than the minimum stated in the bill. It would exempt from coverage employees of retail and service establishments, which do less than $250,000 in sales annually. The bill would affect only those stores grossing less than $250,000 which are a part of a chain which does more than $1 million in business from all of its operations combined. It is a simple amendment which affects relatively few employees, but its adoption is essential to preservation of fair and stable retail operations in small towns. It would merely place these small retail establishments in the same position as the gasoline stations under the bill.

Let me talk for a moment about the nature of the operations of small retail chain stores. These stores are invariably located in the small towns away from the large urban trading centers. They are an important and essential element to the business affairs in a small community. These stores have a very low volume of sales and small margin of profit. Their operations are geared to the economy of their locality. These chains are located throughout the country, but there is a large number of them in the South and Southwest. They are normally owned by residents of the area and their operations have been built up through many years of effort and sacrifice.

These small stores perform a very vital community service. As I have mentioned, their operations are geared to local demand. For example, I understand that many of the small chainstores in the Mississippi Delta stay open until midnight on Saturday night to satisfy the shopping requirements of their customers. They invariably open early and stay open late.

These stores employ many young people and elderly people who ordinarily would not be able to find any type of employment in these small communities.

If these small stores are treated as an equal with the big retail outlets for purposes of minimum wage coverage it will have a chaotic effect upon competition in these towns. Wage rates paid to sales clerks and other employees are now governed by the economic factors peculiar to the trade area. If the wages of these employees are automatically raised by a considerable percentage you can imagine what effect this will have on the local competitive situation. These stores simply cannot pay a minimum wage and remain in competition with their friend across the street whose employees are not covered by the law.

Small retail units such as I am talking about cannot solve the problems which will be brought on by coverage under the act as well as the large retail stores. A large store can adjust its operations to absorb an increase in wages, but a small store with only three or four employees simply does not have the margin of profit or the volume to do so. In addition, the handling of the record-keeping and paperwork required by the Department of Labor will be a real burden on the small-store manager. In all fairness, our Government should treat the small chainstore the same as his local competitor.

I have been told by the owner of a group of small retail stores in Arkansas that the sales clerks in his stores sell on an average day $50 of goods. If these clerks are paid at the rate of $1.25 per hour which will eventually be required under the existing provisions of this bill, the salaries of his sales clerks alone would be 20 percent of sales. Anyone who has any experience with a small retail store realizes that this is an impossible margin. The average margin of profit for all retail stores throughout the country is 3 percent, and it is certainly much less than this in the small stores. It is easy to imagine what will happen to this profit margin in the small chainstores if their employees' wages are increased by a sizable percent. There is no justifiable reason for driving these small chainstores to the wall.

I know that many of you are concerned about the number of workers who will be excluded from coverage by this amendment. Accurate statistics are not available on this point. I have been furnished an estimate by the Department of Labor which is as educated a guess as is available. According to this estimate only 250,000 to 350,000 employees would be effected by my amendment. Practically all of these are employees of retail stores. Gasoline service stations already receive this same treatment under existing provisions of the bill.

In closing I wish to urge my colleagues to look to the economic realities of the situation at which my amendment is directed. No member of this body wishes to deny any employee the right to a living wage. I certainly do not. But, we must be fair and practical in considering the effects of this legislation. There is no valid reason why the small chainstores should be treated as a poor stepchild by the Congress. These stores are doing a commendable job in providing goods at fair prices to people in the small towns and rural areas of this country. They must compete with the nonchain store establishments, and in my opinion the Government would be guilty of promoting unfair competition by not treating them on a unit basis. If the Senate fails to accept my amendment it will be the first time to my knowledge that it has enacted what is clearly antichain store legislation.

I urge that my amendment be adopted.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. FULBRIGHT].

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Delaware. Mr. President, on behalf of my colleague and myself, I call up my amendment identified as 8–10–60—A.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 23, after line 2, it is proposed to insert a new section, as follows:

That section 13(d) of the Fair Labor Standards Act of 1938, as amended, is amended by inserting before the period at the end thereof the following: "or to any homeworker engaged in the making of wreaths composed principally of natural holly, pine, cedar, or other evergreens (including the harvesting of the evergreens or other forest products used in making such wreaths)".

Mr. WILLIAMS of Delaware. Mr. President, I yield myself 2 minutes.

I have discussed this amendment with the chairman of the subcommittee, and he has agreed to take the amendment to conference. The amendment would correct a recent Labor Department ruling, which reversed a standard procedure which had been followed for 20 years. This is definitely an agricultural product and never should have been covered. I understand that the chairman of the subcommittee is willing to accept the amendment and with that understanding, I am glad to yield back the remainder of my time.

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, I told the Senator from Delaware that I would take the amendment to conference. Of course, the Senator knows the difficulties involved in the amendment, but I did tell him I would take it to conference.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Delaware. Yes. I hope it will be accepted in conference. While only a few people are affected it is very important to them. I appreciate the cooperation of the Senator from Massachusetts. I yield back the remainder of my time.

Mr. MANSFIELD. I yield back the remainder of my time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Delaware [Mr. WILLIAMS].

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. GOLDWATER. Mr. President, I call up my amendment identified as "4–29–60—G."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 21, lines 13 and 14, it is proposed to insert the following: "; or (16) any employee employed in an amusement or recreational establishment that operates on a seasonal basis".

Mr. GOLDWATER. Mr. President, I allow myself 2 minutes.

The purpose of the amendment is to provide an exemption from the minimum wage and overtime provisions of the act for employees of those amusement parks and related establishments which operate on a seasonal basis. These establishments for the most part rely on transient employees and operate under unusual conditions. They have special economic and competitive problems which are given recognition by this amendment.

I remind the Senator from Massachusetts that we have excluded similar employees in the motion picture business. It would be only fair to be consistent and allow the relatively few people in the amusement field the same exemption.

Mr. KENNEDY. These people have some special problems, just as the motion picture people do. The amendment involves only a few persons. I have already told the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. WILLIAMS], who is also interested in the subject, that I would take the amendment to conference. I think it may be acceptable.

Mr. GOLDWATER. I yield back the remainder of my time.

Mr. MANSFIELD. I yield back the remainder of my time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Arizona [Mr. GOLDWATER].

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. GOLDWATER. Mr. President, I call up my amendment designated "8–10–60–C," and ask that it be read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 2, between lines 7 and 8, it is proposed to insert the following:

SEC. 3. (a) Paragraph (d) of section 3 of such Act defining the term "employer" is amended by inserting before the period at the end thereof a comma and the following: "or any organization which is exempted from taxation by the provisions of section 501(c)(3) of the Internal Revenue Code of 1954, as amended".

Mr. GOLDWATER. Mr. President, the report accompanying the committee bill states that the term "enterprise" does not include eleemosynary, religious, or educational organizations not operated for profit, and therefore not conducted for any business purpose.

The committee bill does not contain any exclusionary language for those organizations.

My amendment would specifically exclude from the term "enterprise" any employer exempt from taxation under section 501(c)(3) of the Internal Revenue Code, and thus carry out the intent of the committee as expressed in the report.

The amendment would cover such organizations as the Salvation Army, Red Cross, Goodwill Industries, the Lighthouse, nonprofit hospitals, nonprofit educational institutions, and religious institutions.

In my opinion, this is an amendment which the Senator from Massachusetts might well accept.

Mr. KENNEDY. I am not completely clear about the effect of the language of the Senator's amendment. Will the Senator tell me what the effect would be?

Mr. GOLDWATER. The report states that the term "enterprise" would not include eleemosynary, religious, or educational organizations not operated for profit. Yet the committee bill does not contain any exclusionary language. I feel that in the absence of such exclusionary language, organizations like the Salvation Army, Red Cross, Goodwill Industries, the Lighthouse, and others, might come under the meaning of the act. It would bear upon very few employees, but it would put them into interstate commerce. I feel certain that that is not the intent of the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. KENNEDY. Reluctantly, I shall not be able to accept the amendment, only because I believe that if a commercial operation is conducted by a group which is exempt because of the other clauses—for example, the Yale Press, operated by Yale University—that group ought to pay the minimum wage.

Mr. GOLDWATER. The Yale Press is not exempt, is it? I referred to an exemption from taxation under section 501(c)(3) of the Internal Revenue Code. I am not referring to exemptions under the committee bill.

Mr. KENNEDY. Will the Senator tell me whom he would cover by his amendment? Whom does the Senator want to have exempt, who are not now exempt?

Mr. GOLDWATER. The whole field is not exempt by the language of the bill. I have mentioned the Salvation Army, Red Cross, YMCA, YWCA, Goodwill Industries, nonprofit institutions, hospitals, and religious institutions. I do not think the language of the amendment would apply to a church which has a business operation on the side.

Mr. KENNEDY. Is it agreed that churches and eleemosynary institutions are exempt?

Mr. GOLDWATER. That is correct.

Mr. KENNEDY. What would happen in the case of a charitable or a religious group which owned a brewery, a library, or a winery?

Mr. GOLDWATER. It is my understanding that they pay taxes on such operations now, so they would not be exempt.

Mr. KENNEDY. Who would be exempt?

Mr. GOLDWATER. The Salvation Army, for instance, has varying numbers of employees in different cities. Some of its employees do work of a janitorial nature; some do work of an executive nature. I am certain that all of them are paid the minimum wage, or that practically all of them are paid the minimum; but to bring them under Government control would, in my opinion, be imposing a hardship on the organization.

Mr. KENNEDY. It seems to me that protection is afforded eleemosynary, religious, or educational organizations not operated for profit. That is contained in paragraph (d) on page 28 of the report. It is mentioned in the report as well as in the bill.

Mr. GOLDWATER. It is not mentioned in the bill. The bill does not contain exclusionary language. Reference is made to the exclusions in the report. We say in the report that we do not want to include such organizations, but the bill does not contain any language which specifically excludes them.

Mr. KENNEDY. I do not quite understand whom the Senator wishes to have exempt, whom the bill now covers.

Mr. GOLDWATER. I have tried to explain. I do not know how I can do it any better. There are employees of the institutions I have mentioned—the Salvation Army, Red Cross, Lighthouse, tax-exempt foundations, and so forth.

Mr. KENNEDY. Does the Senator from Arizona believe the Salvation Army would be covered?

Mr. GOLDWATER. I do. In the absence of any specific exemption, I think it would come under the term "enterprise". The Salvation Army does some selling for its own use and for its own sustenance.

Mr. KENNEDY. On page 20 of the report there is reference to "related activities." I read from paragraph (d):

The "related activities" of the enterprise must be performed "for a common business purpose." Thus, the definition would not include eleemosynary, religious, or educational organizations not operated for profit.

Mr. GOLDWATER. That is the language of the report. I am sure we do not want such organizations included.

Mr. KENNEDY. I shall reluctantly oppose the amendment only because, in my judgment, we really provide for bona fide nonprofit organizations.

Mr. GOLDWATER. Will the Senator take the amendment to conference and argue about it there?

Mr. KENNEDY. I should like to be a little clearer about the facts. I believe we might be going further than we meant to go.

Mr. GOLDWATER. The Senator must understand the language, because it is contained in the report. We said we did not want to include such organizations.

Mr. KENNEDY. So long as the language is precise in the report, I do not see the need for additional language.

Mr. GOLDWATER. The report is not legislation. Whom does the Senator want to exclude by this language?

Mr. KENNEDY. I do not want to add further exemptions. So long as the Senator from Arizona and I are in agreement, I would object to any amendment with regard to the language. I want to be certain that the language the Senator proposes meets the purposes of the report. In that case, he and I are in complete agreement.

Mr. GOLDWATER. That is correct.

Mr. KENNEDY. Would the Senator mind speaking for another minute or 2, while I recheck the language?

Mr. GOLDWATER. Reject the language?

Mr. KENNEDY. While I recheck it. The question is whether the words which are used in the report on page 28 mean exactly the same as the words of section 501(c)(3) of the Internal Revenue Code of 1954. It seems to me there may be some differences. That is what I want to check.

I may say to the Senator—and I hope we may then end the discussion—that section 501(c)(3) of the Internal Revenue Code of 1954 goes further than the language of the report. Therefore, I prefer to stay with the language of the report, and shall reluctantly oppose the amendment.

Mr. GOLDWATER. I think the Senator from Massachusetts should give the subject some thought, because a question might be raised about an institution like the Lighthouse, which is engaged in a common business purpose. Although I cannot imagine anyone ever wanting to do it, the Lighthouse could be brought under the act.

I ask the Senator whether he has read from the United States Code? Was he reading from page 482 of title 26 of the Internal Revenue Code?

Mr. KENNEDY. I was reading from the section.

Mr. GOLDWATER. I should like to read it; it will not take long:

(3) Corporations, and any community chest, fund, or foundation, organized and operated exclusively for religious, charitable, scientific, testing for public safety, literary, or educational purposes, or for the prevention of cruelty to children or animals, no part of the net earnings of which inures to the benefit of any private shareholder or individual, no substantial part of the activities of which is carrying on propaganda, or otherwise attempting, to influence legislation, and which does not participate in, or intervene in (including the publishing or distributing of statements), any political campaign on behalf of any candidate for public office.

With that explanation of what I understand the meaning of the terms used to be, is the Senator willing to accept this amendment?

Mr. KENNEDY. Let me say to the Senator that I am not anxious to prolong the debate, for obvious reasons.

Mr. GOLDWATER. Yes.

Mr. KENNEDY. It seems to me that the language of the Senator's amendment goes beyond the language of the report. If an eleemosynary institution owned a profitmaking corporation or company, I think it might be exempt, under the language of the Senator's amendment, but not under the language of the report.

Mr. GOLDWATER. Very well.

Mr. President, I yield back the remainder of the time under my control.

Mr. KENNEDY. I yield back the remainder of the time under my control.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. CANNON in the chair). All remaining time has been yielded back.

The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Arizona.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. GOLDWATER. Mr. President, the amendments which have been agreed to thus far today have reduced the number of amendments which I felt it necessary to offer to the bill to the point where I now believe that for me to call up additional amendments at this time would result in unnecessary delay.

We have now been working on this bill for 7 days. Although I cannot agree that the bill is a good one, nevertheless those of us who oppose the bill have certainly had our opportunity to oppose the bill; and I do not wish to delay unduly the further procedure of the Senate in connection with the bill.

Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair does not understand that any amendment is now pending.

Mr. GOLDWATER. Mr. President, I ask that I may proceed at this time for a few minutes.

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Senator from Arizona may proceed at this time for 7 minutes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? Without objection it is so ordered.

Mr. GOLDWATER. Mr. President, I feel very strongly about the bill in connection with the explanation of the meaning of the term "affecting commerce." I am afraid that this bill provides for "a new frontier"; and I am more afraid of it now than I have ever before been, because this language goes far beyond any interpretation the courts heretofore have made in connection with these matters, even though the courts already have ruled so broadly that their interpretations in regard to interstate commerce have already gone about as far as one could possibly imagine they could go.

I am afraid that this bill will negate interpretations which are important for the protection of the small businessmen on the Main Streets of America.

I am afraid that if this bill is enacted into law, the Federal Government will be able to regulate so many businesses, under the provisions of this bill, and to so great an extent, that a very dangerous turn will be taken in this country.

I was very hopeful that the amendment of the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. MONRONEY] would be agreed to, because it would have nailed down a very sensible definition of interstate commerce, and would have done so to so definite an extent that there would no longer have been room for argument. I think the Senate made a very grave mistake when it disregarded the advice of the Senator from Oklahoma, who urged that the Senate adopt that simple definition of interstate commerce, so that the courts would know, once and for all, what the intent of this body was in that connection.

I believe that under the action the Senate has taken, great confusion will result, and there will be much room for the making of interpretations of the type the Court has already delighted in making.

Mr. McCLELLAN. Mr. President, will the Senator from Arizona yield to me?

Mr. GOLDWATER. I yield.

Mr. McCLELLAN. Does the Senator from Arizona believe that as a result of the rejection of the Monroney amendment, the Court would feel all the more entitled to make rulings which would result in having the Federal Government invade to an even greater extent than has heretofore been done the field of intrastate commerce?

Mr. GOLDWATER. Yes, I think that will be the result.

Mr. McCLELLAN. Yes. Today the Senate had an opportunity, by agreeing to the Monroney amendment, to state that it was not its intention to have the power of the Federal Government used to invade intrastate business. But the Senate rejected that amendment.

Mr. GOLDWATER. That is correct; and I believe that the rejection of the amendment will result in two things: First, as the Senator from Arkansas has suggested, Court rulings to the effect that the desire and intention of the Senate is to have the Federal Government regulate and control intrastate commerce; and, second, great harm to the small businesses on the Main Streets of the Nation.

I am very hopeful that in the conference, this part of the bill be deleted. Certainly this is one instance in which I cannot in good conscience attempt to carry out the decision the Senate has reached, if I am one of the conferees; I state that frankly now.

The payment of fair wages is an entirely different matter, because of course, fair wages should be paid.

But, Mr. President, in view of the way the bill now stands, I believe there will be great difficulty in the conference. Furthermore, if this provision is included in the conference report, and if the conference report, including this provision, is adopted, I believe the President will have every right to veto the measure.

Mr. STENNIS. Mr. President, I call up my amendment identified as "8–13–60—A." Inasmuch as the amendment has previously been printed in the RECORD, I ask that the reading of the amendment at this time be dispensed with.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? Without objection, it is so ordered; and the amendment will be printed at this point in the RECORD.

The amendment offered by Mr. STENNIS is as follows:

On page 20, strike out lines 9 to 15, inclusive, and insert the following:

"(10) any employee employed by an establishment which is engaged within the area of production (which shall include, for the purposes of this paragraph and clause (3) of section 7(b), all of each county in which an agricultural or horticultural commodity, including livestock and poultry, is produced in commercial quantities) in handling, packing, storing, ginning, compressing, pasteurizing, drying, preparing in their raw or natural state or canning of such commodity for market, or in making cheese or butter or other dairy products, except that the exemption provided in this paragraph (10) shall not apply to any establishment within such a county which has a gross annual volume of sales in excess of $1,000,000 unless such establishment would have been exempt under the provisions of this paragraph as in effect prior to the enactment of the Fair Labor Standards Amendments of 1960; or".

Mr. STENNIS. Mr. President, I yield myself 5 minutes on the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Mississippi is recognized for 5 minutes.

Mr. STENNIS. Mr. President, my amendment has to do with present law.

The amendment proposes to give the words "area of production" the original intent of present law as it pertains to agricultural and horticultural products, especially with respect to the first processing of such products. For example, in the case of cotton it would pertain to the ginning, baling, and compressing of the cotton bales. With respect to vegetables to be canned, it would apply to the picking, cleaning, and canning.

The original Fair Labor Standards Act exempted workers in the "area of production" engaged in this field by the express terms of the law but left the definition of "area of production" up to the Secretary of Labor.

The law clearly exempts these workers, but there has never been a realistic legislative definition of what "area of production" shall consist of. Congress wrote into the law that it would be defined by the Department of Labor, and those definitions have gradually restricted the areas until now a great many first processors of agricultural products in the area of production do not get the benefit of what was the original intention of the Congress. If those processing plants happen to be located in or within 1 mile of a town of 2,500 or within 3 miles of a city of 50,000 people or within 5 miles of a city of 500,000 people or receive over 5 percent of their business outside a narrow radius, they do not receive the exemption. In the case of cotton gins, many of them moved to town 25 years ago, before there was electricity in rural areas, in order to get the benefit of a cheaper form of energy.

So we have an abnormal situation of the law providing for this exemption, but, as a practical matter, it does not apply for the benefit of these agricultural products.

This amendment is fully explained, and at considerable length, beginning at page 16380 of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of Saturday, August 13 of this year. The substance of the amendment I would propose is already in the House bill and should, therefore, be in conference. Therefore, in view of the lateness of the hour, and the difficulty of fully explaining the technical application of this amendment, I wish to address myself to the Senator from Massachusetts rather than asking for a vote on this complicated and technical matter. I point out that the provisions in this amendment are already in the House bill, and that this entire subject matter will be in conference. In view of the interest in this problem, as set forth in the statement I have referred to, I ask the Senator from Massachusetts to respond, insofar as he can, with respect to this matter being considered in conference and the possibility of some effort to consider it and see what can be done with the House conferees.

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, the Senator from Mississippi has discussed this amendment with me on many different occasions. It is in the House bill. My concern always has been that we would take out too many people who are now covered, and I do not think the Senator from Mississippi is anxious to do that.

I will discuss it with the House Members. I would not be able to support any amendment which took a great many people out of the present coverage of the bill. The Senator from Mississippi knows that. I will consider the matter carefully and see exactly what the effect will be in conference.

Mr. STENNIS. I thank the Senator for that statement. I want to emphasize to him that the practical aspect of this problem is the desire to have a more practical definition of "area of production." It is not merely a matter of taking someone out and putting someone in, but the present definition of "area of production" as defined by the Department of Labor is not real, it does not meet the practical problems, and it does not comply with the congressional intent.

My proposal is merely an attempt to make it more realistic and more practical.

I know the Senator from Florida [Mr. HOLLAND] is interested in this matter, as are many other Senators.

Mr. HOLLAND. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. STENNIS. I am glad to yield to the Senator.

Mr. HOLLAND. Under the studied and completely unreasonable limitations that have been placed on various businesses in my State under the "area of production" general provision in the act, there have been more injustices accomplished than under any other feature of the act that I know about.

Unfortunately, there does not seem to have been any comprehension on the part of the administrator of the act and his field agents with respect to agriculture and agricultural workers in many instances which have come to my attention.

I commend highly the attitude of the distinguished Senator, and I hope that in conference some fixed, stated "area of production" definition can be written into the law so it can be, once and for all, taken away from the administrator and his minions, who have promulgated regulations which have worked ceaseless hardships on agriculture in my State and, from what I hear, in other States in the Nation.

Mr. STENNIS. I thank the Senator. The Senator from Florida speaks with great authority in this matter. I think we can qualify him as an expert in it.

I do not say this critically of the Department of Labor, but here is a case where the Congress attempts to protect and to give a certain exemption, but has never really defined it, and has given the matter of determination to the Department of Labor, whereas agricultural products are involved. I can say the Department of Agriculture has never been pleased or satisfied with the definition of "area of production" because of its impracticality and the fact that it does not carry out the intention of Congress.

Mr. HILL. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. STENNIS. I yield.

Mr. HILL. I commend the Senator. He has been most devoted and dedicated to this matter. In fact, he has been indefatigable in endeavoring to wipe out inequities and bring about justice in this matter.

As the Senator has so well said, the situation has changed considerably since the act was first passed some 22 years ago. What the Congress had then in mind as to what was described as an "area of production" was a different thing from what it is today. It is entirely different. The law should be brought up to date to apply to the situation as it exists today, and not as it existed 22 years ago.

Mr. STENNIS. I thank the Senator.

I think the absurdity of the definition can be illustrated by the fact that if a cotton gin is located in or within a mile of a town of 2,500 people, it is judged to be outside of the area of production, even though it is surrounded by an area that grows cotton almost exclusively. It is ridiculous on its face.

I feel, with the guidance of staff members, as well as Senators who are familiar with this matter, that a practical definition can be worked out in conference.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. STENNIS. I yield.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. I join the Senator from Mississippi in this very fine amendment. It is needed. This definition has caused a great deal of trouble. I have had a great many complaints. I do hope it will be taken to conference and worked out.

Mr. STENNIS. I thank the Senator from Arkansas.

As one who has worked on this matter, I think Congress ought to stand up and write a true and realistic definition of "area of production" into the law.

Mr. President, if no other Senator desires any time, I yield back my remaining time on the amendment, and I do not request a vote.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator withdraw his amendment?

Mr. STENNIS. Yes, I withdraw the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment is withdrawn.

Mr. WILLIAMS of New Jersey. Mr. President, I offer the amendment which I send to the desk and ask to have stated.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 21, line 20, after the word "or" it is proposed to insert:

> Any driver or driver's helper whose compensation is determined on the basis of trip rates, or other delivery payment plan, and whose regular rate of pay is not less than two times the minimum rate applicable to such employee under section 6; or.

Mr. WILLIAMS of New Jersey. Mr. President, I yield myself 30 seconds.

Because of the particular nature of the delivery in certain industries, labor and management have devised a method of payment on the basis of trips rather than on the basis of hours spent in delivery. This has certainly worked well both from the point of view of management and from the point of view of labor. If these people are included under the terms of the bill there will be long and difficult negotiations in an effort to gear their system into the provisions of the bill. Relatively few people are affected, but this is very important to those few who are affected.

I have discussed the amendment at length with the distinguished Senator from Massachusetts, who has guided the bill with such skill and distinction, and also with the distinguished majority leader. It is my impression that the amendment is acceptable to the leadership.

I yield back the remainder of my time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield back his time?

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, I accept the amendment. The people we are now talking about are among the high-paid workers in the United States, and therefore the amendment is really more beneficial to them and to the companies involved. These are not the kinds of workers, under these kinds of situations, for which we wish to make the task more difficult. I accept the amendment on that basis.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator yield back his remaining time?

Mr. KENNEDY. I yield back my remaining time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. WILLIAMS].

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill is open to further amendment.

Mr. COOPER. Mr. President, the amendment I wish to offer is not printed. I offer an amendment to strike from the bill section 6(b)(2), which begins on page 14.

I offer an amendment, on page 14 to strike from the bill section 6(b)(2).

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Will the Senator state the line?

Mr. COOPER. Line 12. I offer an amendment to strike line 12, on page 14, through line 13 on page 15. I offer this amendment for myself and the senior Senator from North Dakota [Mr. YOUNG].

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated for the information of the Senate.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 14, it is proposed to strike out lines 12 through 25, inclusive, and on page 15 it is proposed to strike out lines 1 through 13, inclusive.

Mr. COOPER. Mr. President, may I have the attention of the Senator from Massachusetts?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. How much time does the Senator from Kentucky yield to himself?

Mr. COOPER. Ten minutes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator is recognized for 10 minutes.

Mr. COOPER. The language of the committee bill affects industries engaged in the first processing of, or in canning or packing perishable or seasonable fresh fruits or vegetables, or any agricultural or horticultural commodity during seasonal operations, or in handling, slaughtering, or dressing poultry or livestock.

It is my understanding that these operations are seasonal, and that at present there are times fixed during which the provision requiring time and a half for overtime does not apply. The amendment proposed by the committee would reduce these periods of time, so that after a shorter period the requirement for additional overtime compensation would become effective in these seasonal operations.

As all of us who live in agricultural areas know, a great many of these small businesses—canning businesses and packing businesses—have a very difficult time. They are seasonal operations. There is no way in which the employees at these plants can work day after day on a regular basis. The amendment of the committee, I think, would make these operations much more difficult and much more expensive.

I should like to know the purpose of the committee in changing the periods of time in which these industries are now exempted from the overtime provisions of the law.

Mr. KENNEDY. Is the Senator suggesting we go back to the present language?

Mr. COOPER. Yes.

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, I would oppose that amendment. Under the present situation there are 14 weeks of complete exemption for these jobs and there are 14 weeks of partial exemption; in other words, 12 hours a day, 56 hours a week. We felt that was excessive. However, we talked to the interested parties. I thought we had a general consensus that we would reduce it to 10 weeks of complete exemption and 10 weeks of partial exemption; 12 hours a day, 56 hours a week. I think that represents progress. Otherwise we would have to exempt them for a half-year total; for 3 months to have no minimum wage and no hour limitation, with 60 hours or 70 hours, and for another 3 months to have 12 hours a day, 56 hours a week. That is quite a bit of time to be out from under the coverage of the Minimum Wage Act or the Hours Act.

Our compromise in the present bill, which I support, is 10 weeks of complete exemption and 10 weeks of partial exemption. I hope the Senate will sustain the committee.

Mr. COOPER. Mr. President, when the Fair Labor Standards Act was enacted this special condition was provided for small plants, which was an indication that the committee realized the difficulties these plants have in carrying on seasonal operations.

In the small towns where there are packing plants for tomatoes, potatoes, peas, and all kinds of small fruits, labor is usually recruited from the locality. These plants have an extremely hard time existing. I have seen plant after plant start up, financed by local capital, and go out of business in 2 or 3 years. They are swept out of business by the large operations of the big canning companies.

If we are interested in small agricultural businesses, many of them supported by farmers, I really believe that this section ought to be taken out of the bill.

Mr. YOUNG of North Dakota. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. COOPER. I yield.

Mr. YOUNG of North Dakota. One of the reasons why our minimum wage laws are so objectionable to farmers is that there are small processing plants in many small towns throughout all agricultural areas.

Mr. COOPER. Mr. President, may we have order in the Chamber? I think this is an important amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senate will be in order. Those Senators desiring to carry on conversations will please retire to the cloakrooms.

Mr. YOUNG of North Dakota. During the harvest season, which usually runs for 2 or 3 months in the summertime, these employees will work long hours, but offsetting those long hours of work, in the wintertime they have little or nothing to do. Their employers usually carry them on the payroll and try to keep their businesses in operation. The proposed legislation would force these small processors in the smaller towns out of business or make it very difficult for them to operate their plants. There is no demand for this by the employees. It seems to me the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. KENNEDY] should accept the amendment.

Mr. HOLLAND. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. COOPER. I yield.

Mr. HOLLAND. The part of the country in which I happen to live is full of small plants of the type described. Those plants provide the most desirable employment for people who wish to work in that kind of employment. In the small towns of the State in which I live, nearly every housewife who has a domestic servant loses her domestic help when the canneries are open, because those workers prefer to work in the canneries. They make more money, notwithstanding the fact that in my State we pay well for domestic help because we are always competing with the hotels, restaurants, and other activities that entertain tourists.

No housewife can hope to retain any of her domestic help during the canning season, because those who do such work make so much money, and they want to work as many hours as they can because the time of operation is not great. Within 28 weeks' time one canning plant may handle several different kinds of fruits, vegetables, and berries. They handle highly perishable commodities which must be processed when they are ripe. The plants must have sufficient workers on hand, and they work a sufficient number of hours to handle the fruits or vegetables at the time they are ripe.

I have heard no outcry about this activity but, to the contrary, there is a regular exodus of people going from every other conceivable place where they get work to the canneries, the packing-houses, and the preserving houses when the season offers that kind of employment.

I believe there is an effort on the part of someone—and I think it must be someone in the Wage and Hour Administration because those in the Administration have never been sympathetic toward or understanding of the problems of agriculture in my part of the State—to make more binding upon agricultural producers and workers this law and its operation. I warmly support the amendment offered by my distinguished friends on the other side of the aisle, because I think they must know firsthand some of the problems in this field, which certainly have been evident to me throughout the life of the Wage and Hour Act.

Mr. YOUNG of North Dakota. I thank the Senator from Florida. I hope the Senator from Massachusetts will be able to send this amendment to conference.

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, I should like to accept the amendment because of the interest in it of my friends, the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. YOUNG] and the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. COOPER]. The reason I cannot accept the amendment is this: What are we talking about? Ten weeks without any limitation on wages and hours. Employees can work 70 hours a week for 10 weeks. Then there follows 10 weeks in which employees are limited to 56 hours a week. Before they come under this limitation, the Secretary of Labor must find it is a seasonal job anyway, and the second part of the definition is: "in an industry engaged in the first processing of, or in canning or packing perishable or seasonal fruits or vegetables."

I say Senators ought to vote on this amendment by the yeas and nays, because I know the problem of the people in the industry, but I do not think I can agree. The Senate must make the decision on whether to go back to the previous language providing for 14 weeks, 3 months, with no time limit; 14 weeks, 3 months, 56 hours. That is a long week, too. I oppose the amendment.

Mr. COOPER. Mr. President, I do not wish to delay a vote; I will be brief. These plants mean a great deal to the small towns, and particularly to farming communities. Many small communities and farming areas are trying to diversify their agriculture. They have formed cooperatives of various kinds. For example, in my area the farmers have tried to get into strawberry and small fruit and vegetable production in order to avoid complete dependence on the basic crops, which are often in surplus. These cooperatives are formed to provide markets which make possible new sources of income for the farmer. Farmers have established small packing plants, which provide employment and a new local enterprise for the community, and those plants have a hard time.

As the Senator from Florida has said, the people in those communities who work in the plants receive good pay. They are well satisfied. The committee amendment would discourage and hold back the effort to diversify agriculture in many rural areas.

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. COOPER. I yield.

Mr. KENNEDY. In order to correct the RECORD, the language about which we have had a good deal of discussion was not suggested by the Wage and Hour Administration, but is the language which was finally offered by the Senator from Illinois [Mr. DIRKSEN]

Mr. COOPER. I have not been a member of the committee this year, of course, but I was a member last year and the year before, when we were discussing the bill, and the basic language was in the bill at that time. It may have been amended. But it was in the bill when it was first introduced.

Mr. HOLLAND. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. COOPER. I yield.

Mr. HOLLAND. In my part of the country where fruits and vegetables constitute a major product of agriculture, not only do all the women who want that type of work in our area work at this occupation whenever they have an opportunity, but they think it is the finest thing that comes to them in the course of a year. The size of our production is such that women flock in from adjoining States by the hundreds and even by the thousands for this kind of work, and the more hours they can get the better they like it, because it lasts only a little while and they make more money than they can elsewhere.

I am not exaggerating. This will be in the record. It can be measured against the fact. They come down by the thousands from the adjoining States, and we are happy to have them. They come down in search of this seasonal work and for as many hours of work as they can get, because it fills their pockets. They are able to go back with more money than they could obtain with the more limited time operation that is provided by the amendment.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. COOPER. I yield.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. I wish to confirm what the Senator from Florida has said. The fruit and vegetable area, in the northern part of my State particularly, is not a large industry. The industry does not constitute a large part of the economy of my State, but there are a few small plants that process spinach and other vegetables and fruits. Workers come from all around the area, particularly the farming areas, for a short time. They want to work all they can because they want to return home. I think the amendment is an excellent one.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Kentucky yield back the remainder of his time?

Mr. COOPER. I yield back the remainder of my time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Do the opponents of the amendment yield back the remainder of their time?

Mr. KENNEDY. I yield back the remainder of our time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. COOPER].

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, I ask for a division.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. A division is requested.

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The Chief Clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

NOT VOTING—4

Hennings	Murray	O'Mahoney
Martin

So the amendment offered by Mr. COOPER, on behalf of himself and Mr. YOUNG of North Dakota, was agreed to.

Mr. MORTON. Mr. President, I move that the Senate reconsider the vote by which the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. DIRKSEN. I move to lay that motion on the table.

The moton to lay on the table was agreed to.

Mr. THURMOND. Mr. President, I call up my amendment designated "8–17–60—E," which is at the desk. I ask that it be made the pending business and read. The junior Senator from Florida [Mr. SMATHERS], the senior Senator from South Carolina [Mr. JOHNSTON], and the junior Senator from Mississippi [Mr. STENNIS] are cosponsors of the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. On page 22, between lines 18 and 19, it is proposed to insert the following:

(10) any employee of a locally owned and controlled establishment engaged in the wholesale or bulk distribution of petroleum products, if more than 75 per centum of such establishment's annual dollar volume of sales is made within the State in which the establishment is located; or

Mr. THURMOND. Mr. President, I yield myself 4 minutes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from South Carolina is recognized for 4 minutes.

Mr. THURMOND. I believe I can conclude my remarks within the 4 minutes I have yielded myself.

Mr. President, this amendment would merely exempt from the overtime provisions of the Fair Labor Standards Act any employee of a locally owned and controlled establishment engaged in the wholesale or bulk distribution of petroleum products, if more than 75 percent of such establishment's annual dollar volume of sales is made within the State in which such establishment is located.

These wholesale and bulk distributors of petroleum products, commonly referred to as oil jobbers, are primarily local businessmen who acquire these products from their suppliers' bulk terminal in the State in which the jobber does business, and sell these products to service stations, farmers, and homeowners in the State in which they maintain their place of business. Over 80 percent of these jobbers have gross annual sales which amount to less than $1 million, exclusive of gasoline excise taxes. Approximately 50 percent of these small businessmen have annual gross sales of less than $250,000, the amount of exemption granted to gasoline service stations. I am advised that 98.3 percent of all the oil jobbers in the United States sell their products only in the State in which their place of business is located, thus qualifying by any definition as local merchants.

Mr. President, there is a strong possibility that the provisions of section 3 (t) (4) of this bill bring these oil jobbers within the definition of an "enterprise engaged in an activity affecting commerce," for the Department of Labor appears to have taken the position that the employee of the wholesale or bulk distributor of petroleum products who takes delivery of the petroleum products from the supplier's bulk terminal within the State and delivers these products to the storage facilities of the wholesale or bulk distributor is engaged in interstate commerce. The position of the Department of Labor stems from nonacquiscence in the case of Mitchell v. Livingston and Thebaut Oil Co. (256 F. 2d 757), decided by the Fifth Circuit Court of Appeals on June 30, 1958. In that case it was held specifically that the interstate movement of the petroleum products terminated when petroleum products were placed in the refining company's storage tanks and that no activity of the oil jobbers was in interstate commerce. A rehearing was denied, and the case was not appealed by the Department of Labor. Nevertheless, it is my understanding that the Department of Labor still takes a position contrary to the decision.

Mr. President, almost all of these local oil jobbers now pay the minimum wage or above. These oil jobbers, however, are engaged not only in the wholesale handling of petroleum products, but also in bulk distribution to ultimate consumers, and to that extent constitute a retail operation. These bulk distributions take the form of direct deliveries to farmers during seasons of planting and harvesting, and to home consumers of fuel oil during the winter season. During these periods, many of these oil jobbers find it necessary to operate for long hours, whereas at other times of the year their work is accomplished in a normal 8-hour day or less.

I call the Senate's attention to the third paragraph on page 27 of the committee report, which discusses the nature of a locally owned and controlled establishment. The independent oil jobber comes clearly within the definition of a locally owned and controlled establishment, and should be accorded treatment as such. By means of this amendment, I do not propose to exclude this local merchant from coverage under section 3(t)(4) insofar as the minimum wage is concerned, although it is my personal opinion that such local merchants should not be covered at all by the Fair Labor Standards Act. This amendment would only exempt this local merchant engaged to an appreciable extent in seasonal business from the overtime provisions of the act.

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, as the amendment is drafted, it affects comparatively few persons. So I will take the amendment to conference.

Mr. THURMOND. I thank the Senator very much.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from South Carolina yield back the remainder of the time available to him?

Mr. THURMOND. I do.

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, I do likewise.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. All remaining time on the amendment has been yielded back.

The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. THURMOND].

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill is open to further amendment.

If there be no further amendment to be proposed, the question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, and was read the third time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill having been read the third time, the question is, Shall it pass?

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, on the question of final passage, I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Senate now proceed to the consideration of House bill 12677.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to consider the bill, H.R. 12677, to amend the Fair Labor Standards Act of 1938, as amended, to provide coverage for employees of interstate retail enterprises, to increase the minimum wage under the act to $1.15 an hour, and for other purposes.

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, I move that all after the enacting clause of House bill 12677 be stricken out, and that there be inserted, in lieu thereof, the text of Senate bill 3758, as amended.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Massachusetts.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. HOLLAND. Mr. President——

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, will the Senator from Florida yield briefly to me?

Mr. HOLLAND. I yield 2 minutes to the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, let me say that, according to the best information we can obtain, the bill now covers approximately 4,050,000 persons, or less than the number the bill covered when it first came to the floor. Nevertheless, all things considered, I think this is a good bill, and I believe it will make a real difference in the lives of many hundreds of thousands of persons who will be affected beneficially by it.

Therefore, Mr. President, I hope the bill will be passed by the Senate.

Mr. HUMPHREY. Mr. President, will the Senator from Florida yield 2 minutes to me?

Mr. HOLLAND. I yield.

Mr. HUMPHREY. Mr. President, before the bill is passed, I wish to express to the distinguished senior Senator from Oregon [Mr. MORSE] my sincere thanks for his very fine work in handling this very complicated piece of legislation. It seems to me that not only have we done a good job legislatively, but we have also learned a great deal about labor law. So I should like to express to the distinguished senior Senator from Oregon our very great appreciation, not only for his leadership, but also for his instruction.

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, will the Senator from Florida yield one-half a minute to me?

Mr. HOLLAND. I yield.

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, I am almost speechless after hearing the kind words of the Senator from Minnesota. I deeply appreciate them.

I wish to express to the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. KENNEDY], the chairman of our subcommittee, my very great appreciation for the many courtesies he has extended to all members of the committee at all times during the consideration of the bill and the work on it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question now is on the engrossment of the amendment and the third reading of the bill.

The amendment was ordered to be engrossed, and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill having been read the third time, the question is, Shall it pass?

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, on this question, I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. HOLLAND. Mr. President, I wish I could join in rejoicing with my friends about this bill. I cannot. I cannot vote for the bill. I think it is a very bad bill. I think that will be more readily apparent as the people who are affected by it have an opportunity to give their reaction to those who have sponsored and voted for its passage.

There have been some rays of sunshine through the clouds as we have proceeded with the consideration of this bill.

I congratulate the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. COOPER] and the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. YOUNG] for offering an amendment which was helpful, and which will help both producers and workers in the vegetable and fruit areas of our Nation.

I congratulate the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. FULBRIGHT] for having offered an amendment which will give some protection and relief to small units in highly necessary mercantile establishments in the small towns of our Nation so they will have some chance to compete with the great monopolistic merchants of our Nation.

I congratulate the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. ANDERSON], my distinguished colleague [Mr. SMATHERS], and the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. THURMOND] for their success in having adopted an amendment which gives some relief to hotels, restaurants, motels, and automobile dealers, and, finally, the agricultural equipment dealers in our Nation, because I think all those measures were meritorious proposals, and proposals which give relief—which ought to have been given, however, to many other businesses.

I am glad those businesses are out of the bill. I am glad the measures I have mentioned have been adopted, but I wish they had been extended as generously to a great many other businesses in our Nation.

I think it is a rather sorry record when we exempt from the provisions of the bill big organizations like the greatest hotel groups—and I voted for that measure because I was trying to bring all the relief we could to as many groups as possible, into the bill—and at the same time give no relief to small establishments in the mercantile business and service industries of our Nation.

I think it will be pretty hard for the Senate, and particularly for the sponsors of this bill, to explain why some of the measures that are in it have been included in it.

I shall not weary the Senate by discussing again the use of the word "enterprise," which brings great groups of small businesses under this act when they are doing nothing more criminal than working together to try to meet the competition of big business. I have already discussed that subject, and I shall not repeat it.

I shall not, either, talk about the definition of "business affecting interstate commerce," which I think is a very bad standard and precedent to write into this bill. The mere fact that large numbers have been included under the commerce clause by the Supreme Court decisions in other fields does not mean anything as to its legality in this field.

I am sorry section 3(t)(4) is in the bill, because it brings within the purview of this act 1 million workers who are not in big business, but in small businesses of between $250,000 and $1 million in annual volume. Very little has been said about those 1 million workers, because it has been stated so frequently on the floor, and in the press, and otherwise, that this bill hits at big business that, by the mere repetition of that statement, a great many people, and even a great many Senators, have come to believe that is the case. In one section of the bill a million workers from businesses which would be regarded as small, by any fair standard, are included under the purview of the act for the first time.

I shall not discuss those matters in detail. I am very happy, however, that the RECORD shows so clearly that the Senate is not asking by unanimous voice any serious consideration of the bill. The amendment of the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. MONRONEY] failed of passage by one vote. That amendment would have preserved the interstate philosophy, which should be engrafted into this bill, and always has been—not in its fullest meaning, but in some measure. The RECORD will show very clearly that the Senate was as evenly divided as it was possible to be in the vote on that amendment.

There are other votes in this connection which show very clearly that the Senate is not as a group for this bill. The RECORD shows that, in order to beat the Monroney amendment, it was very clear that certain accommodations had to be made, which were spoken of here on the floor, under which the action with respect to the hotels, restaurants, automobile dealers, and agricultural equipment dealers finally took place.

I do not criticize that. All legislation in a controversial field is a matter of compromise. But I call attention to the fact that but for that accommodation, which did some good for some limited businesses, and some of them very big organizations, the Senate would have impressed upon this legislation the same requirement in part that has always been in this bill—that interstate business, to be affected, must be truly interstate business and must exist in more than one State.

I sincerely hope that this bill will have the life which it so very richly deserves, that is, a life of short shrift, when it gets to conference, if it ever does.

I note with pleasure the great difference between this bill and the House bill, and I have it from sources that are reliable, that the members of the House committee which considered this particular measure, who will sit in conference, have very definite ideas that are not even in slight accord with the philosophy of this bill. I hope the House will continue to take the wiser course in this matter and will insist on it.

I wanted to make these brief remarks because, in my judgment, as it is now, the bill represents perhaps the greatest hodgepodge of any bill I have seen emerge from the Senate floor; and I think it should be so regarded by anyone who looks at it with any degree of care.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HOLLAND. I yield to the Senator from South Dakota.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. Mr. President, I wish to express appreciation for the constructive way in which the Senator from Florida has participated in debate of this bill, and particularly at this time for his fine summary of the situation that now exists.

I shall not vote for the bill. In spite of the fact that certain amendments have been adopted, it still represents an additional burden placed upon the rural sections of the country, on the farmers. I think it will increase the so-called cost-price squeeze which has been plaguing the farmers for some years. I think it will cause further difficulties in conditions under which businesses in the smaller communities operate. Therefore, I shall vote against the bill.

I think the Senator from Florida has performed a distinct service in the summary he has made.

Mr. HOLLAND. I thank the distinguished Senator. I yield the floor.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, I rise to make a few observations about the bill, and I shall not detain the Senate long. In the long run, we cannot serve the men and women who work in the small enterprises of this country by enlarging the scope of the Federal Government.

In the proposed legislation violence has been done to the concept of what is Federal jurisdiction and what is State jurisdiction. It will not move in the direction of encouraging enterprise. It will add to the cost-price squeeze which is faced not only by farmers but which is also faced by all those businesses which serve farmers exclusively.

Mr. President, I have asked the Library of Congress to prepare a table on price and earning indexes from 1955 to 1960. I ask unanimous consent that the table may be printed in the RECORD at this point.

There being no objection, the table was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Price and earning indexes, 1955–60

	Annual, 1955	Annual, 1959	1955–59, percent increase	Latest, 1960 (March unless otherwise specified)	Percent increase, 1955–60

[1] February.

[2] The projected fiscal 1960 figures were derived by computing the increase in Federal Government salaries between the end of fiscal 1958 and 1959 and adding this sum to the 1959 salaries. This is based on the assumption that the ingrade and upgrade adjustments in all the schedules but the wage board will be the same in 1960 and that wage board employees will be given a 5-percent wage boost as in 1959.

Sources: Bureau of Labor Statistics and Civil Service Commission.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, this table shows that full-time civilian Federal employees have had on an average a wage increase of 24 percent from 1955 to the spring of 1960. This table was prepared before the last pay raise. Since these figures were compiled a pay raise of 7½ percent has been given to all Government employees. Those wages fixed by the wage board have had the highest percentage of increase, the postal workers have had the lowest, but the overall average is 24 percent. Wages in manufacturing have increased in the same period of time an average of 21.8 percent. Interstate railroads have had a wage increase from 1955 to the first part of this year of 33.2 percent. This is a big bill for the farmer to pay. It is the farmers, not the consumers, who pay the freight on getting livestock and grain and other products to market.

Wages in the telephone industry have increased 23 percent and telegraph industry 22 percent, in gas and electric utilities the percentage of increase in the same period is 26 percent, and in wholesaling and retailing the increase has been 20 percent and 19 percent respectively.

These wage increases have meant price increases. Prices of iron and steel have gone up from 1955 to March of this year over 21 percent. I believe it is an established fact that the farmers of America buy more steel than any industry. The price of farm machinery has gone up during the same period almost 18 percent. Coal has gone up over 18 percent, and the wholesale price index for all commodities is up 8.4 percent.

Transportation has gone up 15.6 percent. Medical care has gone up 21.5 percent, and so on. The farmers, along with all other consumers, continue to pay more and more and more.

Mr. President, in the proposed legislation we are not only abandoning the traditional and constitutional provisions as to what constitutes the jurisdiction of the Federal Government, but we are also setting in motion increases in prices which will wipe out any advantage of real purchasing power which appears to have been given to wage earners in the bill.

Mr. President, this is not good legislation. It is not in accord with the rigid constitutional concepts of the country. It will bring forth inflation, thus making a mockery of increased wages it pretends to give to individuals. It is an act directly against rural America. It will add to the costs which farmers must pay.

Not long ago an article was published in the press to the effect that the total gross receipts for farm products in Nebraska had reached an all time high, yet when one reads a little further in the article the same survey shows that the costs of operation increased more rapidly and, as a result, net income was down.

The causes are many—the fiscal position of this country, whether we live within our budget, and abuses in management and labor, wherever they exist, though for the most part people are honest. Legislation of this kind is destroying small business in America. It is making it difficult for small and medium-sized farmers to operate.

Mr. President, I am not speaking of the marginal farmers. I am saying that the proponents of this measure today are taking away the dwindling income of the farmers of America.

Mr. President, I am aware that nothing we say will change the scheduled passage of this bill, but let the RECORD show that we are abandoning the very fundamental concept as to what is interstate commerce, and let the RECORD also show that we are not extending to working people or to anyone else any real increase in net income.

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. President, even though this bill is not everything many of us would have liked, even though it has been diluted somewhat in form from what it was when it came from the committee, nevertheless we must recognize the fact that in addition to the 23 million people now under the protection of the Fair Labor Standards Act the proposed legislation to be voted on shortly will, if passed, add approximately 4 million more. In other words, a total of up to 27 million American citizens could be covered under the Fair Labor Standards Act.

There have been some deletions from the bill as reported by the Committee on Labor and Public Welfare. There was some reduction in the number of those covered under the Anderson amendment, for which I voted, but for which the Senator from Massachusetts, the chairman of the subcommittee and the author of the measure, sticking to his principles, did not vote. It was a vote, of course, which many of us felt impelled to make because of the implied assumption that this was the only possible alternative to the Monroney proposal.

The bill has received full and fair consideration. It is a difficult bill to understand. It will be a difficult bill to adjust in conference.

Contrary to what the distinguished Senator from Florida [Mr. HOLLAND] has said—and he made a great many contributions to the debate—I hope the House Committee on Rules will see to it that conferees are appointed in the House and that through the due legislative, democratic process this measure will be brought to conference and the will of both Houses in that manner given consideration.

I think the leaders of our party—the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. KENNEDY], the author of the bill; and the senior Senator from Texas, the majority leader [Mr. JOHNSON]—both made significant and great contributions toward its passage. I commend them both for their understanding and their concentration on the possible rather than the unattainable.

Also the Senator from Florida [Mr. HOLLAND] was very diligent and spent time profitably in making his points and his arguments clear. He likewise made a significant contribution to clearing up some poorly defined aspects of the measure. On the other side, the distinguished Senators from Pennsylvania [Mr. CLARK] and New Jersey [Mr. WILLIAMS] assumed the leadership, on the necessary occasions and conducted themselves in a statesmanlike and well-informed manner. The distinguished Senator from Arizona [Mr. GOLDWATER] showed himself to be quite statesmanlike in his consideration of this measure, despite the fact that he was opposed to it all the way through.

I commend the Senator from Illinois, the distinguished minority leader [Mr. DIRKSEN] who likewise made a great contribution to a fair and full consideration of the bill.

I am surprised that we are on the verge of passage of the bill 8 days after it was brought before the Senate by the Junior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. KENNEDY].

I had thought that if we finished this bill by the end of this week we would be doing well. I think our action indicates what can be done, in spite of the fact that extraneous and totally unrelated matters are brought before us from time to time. This is not an unconstitutional measure. The will of the electorate through their representatives in this Chamber has been worked and out of this has come on the whole a very fair compromise which will extend the act, give coverage to an additional 4 million people and, as far as we are concerned, bring about the fulfillment of one of the bits of unfinished business which we came back to attend to.

The present bill, along with the Antarctic Treaty, the work already accomplished on three executive agreements indicates that we have done a great deal of work already. In addition to that, we have a public works bill. Before long we shall have a mutual security bill. On that basis I think so far we have made a very constructive contribution to the welfare of our country.

Before I close I wish to compliment the distinguished senior Senator from Oregon [Mr. MORSE], who on this occasion, as on so many other instances affecting the welfare of the laboring men of this country—and that includes the farmer—has again made a significant and worthy contribution. The Senate is extremely fortunate to have a man of the high legal and legislative ability of the Senator from Oregon [Mr. MORSE], and the many contributions that the Senator from Oregon has made will long be remembered by those who have been guided to a large extent by his advice and counsel to bring in this bill, guided because we have faith and trust in him, guided because he has the ability and the understanding to define and to explain many of the difficult points in this measure. On the whole, I think the Senate has done an extremely good job and I compliment every Senator in this body because each and every one of them has made a contribution of merit.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, I should like to join the Senator from Montana in the complimentary remarks he has made about distinguished Senators who opposed the bill. I believe they stood up for their convictions. They did a fine job. I regret that a majority of the Senate is about to conclude that they were wrong, because I honor them for their adherence to principle.

This is a good bill, a bill hammered out on the anvil of controversy and compromise, a bill in the best American tradition. The bill should be viewed in historical perspective. There are still some Senators who can remember the days when Franklin Roosevelt first proposed fair labor standards legislation, when the minimum wage was only 25 cents an hour. They know what progress we have made since that time in building a floor under the misery of American workers who needed the protection of the Federal Government to give them an opportunity for a decent life and a decent living.

This bill takes a long step forward in eliminating poverty in our country by adding 4 million more Americans to the protection provided by the Fair Labor Standards Act.

The bill is in the tradition of our party on this side of the aisle. I regret that there are a few members of our party who do not see it that way. I think the overwhelming majority of the Democrats in the Senate will stand by their party's platform and vote for this good bill.

I pay my homage and tribute to the fine Members on the other side of the aisle who in a few moments will cast their votes in support of the provisions of the Republican platform, which also pledges to increase the coverage of the minimum wage law by several million people. I am sure that, in a bipartisan way, in a few moments we shall vote to advance American civilization a few steps farther forward, dealing with people and not with things, putting the conscience of the community ahead of the economics of the reactionary.

I hope that we can move on from here in the days ahead toward our eventual goal, which I am sure is a bipartisan goal, of eliminating poverty and, as I say again, establishing a floor beneath which we will not permit misery to sink. These things are more important than the legalistic, quasi-constitutional, ancient doctrine which I believe represents an age that is past. The bill represents a strong step in support of the age that is thronging before us.

I hope the bill will be passed by a resounding majority of the Senate. I express by appreciation to all our colleagues who worked so hard toward this end, and again express my appreciation to those who, in the best of faith and with the highest possible principles, opposed it. This, I think, is a great night for the Senate, and I am happy to pledge my support of the proposed legislation.

Mr. PROUTY. Mr. President, in order that the purpose of the committee in using the enterprise concept may be made a part of the legislative history on this bill, I ask unanimous consent to have printed at this point in the RECORD a statement relating to the proviso qualifying the definition of the word "enterprise."

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

PROVISO QUALIFYING THE DEFINITION OF THE WORD "ENTERPRISE"

It was the purpose of the committee in using the enterprise concept to bring under the act large retail and service chain operations. However, it became clear after discussions in committee that the language in the definition was so broad that it might bring under the Fair Labor Standards Act the operators of some small firms simply because they have small business arrangements with big corporations. For example, take the individual who operates a gas station and leases the station from Standard Oil Co. The individual is the one who suffers the loss or enjoys the profit involved in operating the filling station and there is no reason in the world why he should be covered by the Fair Labor Standards Act simply because he leases his filling station from a big corporation.

The proviso makes it clear that the individual running the filling station wouldn't want to come under Federal regulations simply because his landlord is Standard Oil.

There are other situations where merchants agree to buy certain types of products from a big corporation and to sell only the big company's product. The arrangement is mutually satisfactory because the big company has a good customer in the merchant and the merchant can carry a well advertised product that the public wants. It would be unfair, however, simply because of this arrangement to conclude that the merchant is under the control of and is part of the operation of a big company. Because of the proviso the merchant will only come under the Fair Labor Standards Act if his volume of sales reaches the million dollar figure.

There are still other groups who have a difficult time competing with chainstores and they, as individual merchants, form some type of organization so that they can get the benefit of mass purchasing. If they don't do this the chain will drive them out of business. Each one of these small stores enjoys the profit or suffers the loss of its operation and the mass purchasing arrangement is simply a device of cooperation so that all as individual storekeepers will be able to keep above water.

The proviso covers still another situation such as the Howard Johnson setup. As I understand it, any one operating a Howard Johnson restaurant has to take a loss if the business folds and keeps the profits if the business is successful. The operator of the individual restaurant simply has an arrangement whereby it has promised to use the brand name and restaurant name of Howard Johnson, and it purchases the products used in the restaurant from a large corporation. Whether the individual restaurant operator in this situation comes under the Fair Labor Standards Act will depend upon whether he, in his own establishment, does a million dollars or more in sales per year. The sales of the manufacturer of the products used in the restaurant will not be computed for the purpose of determining whether the individual restaurant owners would be covered.

A careful reading of the definition of the word "enterprise" and the proviso which accompanies it brings sharply to focus the fact that all of the arrangements Congress wants to exempt are not spelled out and basically the test the courts should employ is to look at the receipts of an individual store, filling station, restaurant or other retail or service establishment to see who takes from the receipts the profits. It should be made clear, however, that some big chain grocery operations can't evade compliance with the Fair Labor Standards Act simply by the device of setting up a series of separate corporations if control of the entire operation or profits from the whole operation rest with or go to the same people.

Mr. TALMADGE. Mr. President, I deeply regret that I cannot support the bill in its present form. I still cannot put my stamp of approval on legislation that goes beyond the purview of the delegated powers of our National Government in the Constitution of the United States. The Constitution, of course, gives to Congress the power to regulate interstate commerce.

From time to time Congress, through appropriate legislation, has regulated interstate commerce, but it does not grant the Congress the power to regulate intrastate commerce. I am totally and completely in sympathy with those who work in industry and receive inadequate wages. I should be happy by my vote this evening to raise those wages, provided that action were limited to the purview of powers delegated by the Constitution of the United States to this body. I have been among those who have complained about the usurpation of power by our Federal Government, and I cannot cast a vote that will result in further usurpation of power by our National Government that is not authorized by the Constitution of the United States. The bill will go to conference with the House of Representatives. I hope that in the conference the conferees will scale it down to a bill to regulate interstate commerce. If it comes back to this body for approval with a limitation by which it affects only interstate commerce and not intrastate commerce, I shall be happy to cast my vote therefor. I for one am unwilling to cast my vote for a bill that will enable the long arm of the Federal Government to reach into the 50 sovereign States of the Union and give them control of commerce that originates within a State and terminates within a State. That is a power that has not been delegated and is a power that the Congress ought not to try to take away from the various States.

Mr. HUMPHREY. Mr. President, each of us now has an opportunity to express his philosophy relating to the bill, and I surely wish to commend my colleagues for their forthright statements. There is obviously a difference of opinion on the constitutional interpretation relating to the bill. There is no more brilliant and forceful advocate of one point of view than the able junior Senator from Georgia.

Mr. TALMADGE. I thank my friend.

Mr. HUMPHREY. I can say that with all sincerity. He surely makes a fine contribution to our deliberations.

I wish to mention a thought which has been expressed and which I believe is entirely erroneous. A determined effort has been made to place the blame for the difficulties of our rural people upon those who live in metropolitan areas and work in shops or factories. The problems which American farmers face are not caused by the fact that a worker is going to get $1.25 an hour. Few people in this Nation of ours can live on as little as $50 a week, as a breadwinner or alone. That is not an exorbitant wage. The American farmer is not asking that the workers of America be treated as if they were peons or peasants. The American farmer is asking only that he receive a fair price for his production. He is not asking that his net income be based upon the low income of the working people.

The best customer of the farmer is the worker. It is not always the corporation executive. The man who is the best customer of the producer of the food and fiber of America is the person who works in the mine, the shop, the factory, or in transportation.

I am rather surprised that anyone would say that $1.25 an hour is too much for anyone to receive in any job anywhere in the United States.

If the American farmer had parity for his production, he would not worry if the minimum wage were $1.50 an hour.

If the American farmer were not the victim of a farm program and an administration which has forced the farmers into second-class economic citizenship, he would be here lobbying for the bill. The farm people are not seeking to have their prosperity taken out of the misery of other people. Our farmers ask for fair prices, and parity of income. They are entitled to it.

I represent one of the biggest farm States in the Union. I can say that the farmers of Minnesota are not asking the people of Minnesota who work in stores or in hotels or in the automobile industry or in laundries to be paid less. We want people to be able to drink the milk which our dairies produce. When people receive low wages, they do not drink milk; they consume less.

Mr. TALMADGE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HUMPHREY. I yield.

Mr. TALMADGE. I agree with the Senator that those who work for a living are those who purchase the products produced on our farms. The prosperity of one is dependent upon the other. I serve with the able Senator on the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, and I know of his dedication to the farmers of the Nation. Does the Senator recall what the average hourly income of the farmers of America is?

Mr. HUMPHREY. The hourly income of the farmers of the Nation today is under 60 cents an hour.

Mr. TALMADGE. In other words, if the farmer worked for anyone else, he would be put in jail for violating the wage-and-hour law; is that correct?

Mr. HUMPHREY. The answer is for this Congress and this administration to give the farmer a fair income standard. The Senator from Minnesota and the Senator from Georgia and others have championed that cause. We have championed the cause of fair prices and parity of income for agriculture. I do not believe that when we lift one, we should hold the other down. I do not believe that the justification for holding one down is in holding another down.

I long for the day when the same kind of fair standard for farmers will be passed in the Senate as is advanced for all workers. I have a feeling that a fair income standard for farmers will be advanced by the person in the Senate who brought the pending bill to the Senate, the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. KENNEDY]. Agriculture will be given its fair price and income program.

I have listened to what the bill may do to the small businessman. My colleagues must be bored by my telling them that I know something about small business. I do. I am proud of it. It is not theory. I speak from actual experience. I come from a family which has been in small business for over 50 years. It is a good business. We never made profit from anyone who was paid less than a living wage. It is not possible to operate a business today with low income customers. Business profit is based on a high standard of living for all Americans.

If some Members of Congres were as concerned over the rise in interest rates, which really chokes small business, as they are over the rise in the minimum wage, and were as concerned over the rise in transportation rates as they are over a slight rise in the minimum wage, perhaps we would have less difficulty in this country today for our independent businessmen and our farmers. I have opposed these fantastic increases.

America will never be in trouble for paying the great bulk of its citizens a fair wage. I have seen very few workers who are paid $1.25 an hour enjoying their vacation on the Mediterranean or in the Caribbean on a yacht. They are lucky to get a rowboat in northern Minnesota.

I am proud of the fact that I can support the bill. I only wish it were a better bill. I have the feeling that the day will come when we will do better. However, we know that in legislation we do not always receive what we seek. We were compelled to compromise on this bill. That is progress, constructive progress, reasonable progress, taking into consideration the need of retailers and small business under a million dollars. When anyone talks to me about small business, that is what I mean by small business. I do not mean business above that.

I believe this is a fair bill, and I am happy to vote for it. I commend those who brought it to the Senate.

Mr. LAUSCHE. Mr. President, I am in accord with the wage provisions in the bill. I am in accord with the objective to extend the coverage. I have no hesitation in expressing my approval of the contemplated rise in the wages, and the expansion of the coverage.

I would like very much to vote for the bill. If I were convinced that the limitation now fixed in the bill would continue in the future, I would vote for the measure.

The present provisions are that all businesses, manufacturers, and enterprises in the United States shall have placed upon them the harness of Federal Government direction, except those which do a volume of business which is less than $1 million. I would go along with that, if I could be assured that it would be the level at which the qualifications would remain.

I predict that in 1961 we will be fighting a proposal to reduce the qualification below a million dollars. I think that is inevitable.

I pose this question for my colleagues: Will the qualification remain at a million dollars? If Congress can take jurisdiction on the basis of a million dollars, what will prevent it from reducing the amount to $500,000, to $250,000, or even to $10,000, if Congress so desires?

The proposal of the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. MONRONEY] would have covered 3,800,000. The bill in its present status will cover 4 million. The proposal of the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. MONRONEY] had within it a relationship to the constitutional provisions of the interstate commerce clause. It provided that the act would apply only when the operator was situated in two or more States.

My query is: Why has it been insisted that the definition should be "commerce" or "business affecting commerce"? Why has that been insisted upon? Why has not the proposal of the Senator from Oklahoma been accepted? To me, the answer is simple. The proposal as it is now contained in the bill has fixed a new philosophy, and it has placed Congress in a position to take increasing control over every businessman, every little entrepreneur, within the country.

I come to another thought. The Senate, thinking honestly and genuinely, did not subscribe to the definition contained in the bill that all businesses shall be covered. The count which was taken and the estimate that was made while the Monroney amendment was being considered indicated that the Monroney amendment would carry. What happened? In order to place the harness of Congress upon all businessmen, it was found necessary to exempt the hotels of the country and the automobile salesmen, the motel operators, and the restaurant operators, as well. Let us examine that subject for 1 minute.

The argument is made that we will protect the worker against the exploitation of the employer. We will do this because the workers are engaged in interstate commerce when they are connected with something which eventually gets into the flow of commerce.

I need not mention the Hilton Hotels, the Statler Hotels, the Sheraton Hotels. How can their operations be genuinely and honestly exempt? The little hardware storekeeper in Tennessee or Ohio will be covered by the bill. He operates within the State. The large hotels, operating in every large State of the Union, and, I venture to say, doing $200 million worth of business a year, have been exempted. Why have they been exempted? That was the only way in which the bill could be passed.

The Senator from Florida has declared that this has been an accommodation. Perhaps I have not been in the Senate long enough to adopt that concept of decent approach. I cannot. I do not know whether the distinguished Senator from Oregon, Judge LUSK, can.

Mr. LUSK. No; I cannot.

Mr. LAUSCHE. I cannot subscribe to that approach as a proper method of having legislation passed.

The Senator from Tennessee [Mr. KEFAUVER] offered an amendment to exclude one little laundry operator in Tennessee. He said to me later, "My amendment was improperly drawn. If I had included all laundry operators, I probably would have got them out of the bill."

I said to the Senator from Tennessee, "You made a mistake. You could have got the laundry enterprise out if you had said, 'I will vote in favor of the Monroney amendment if laundry operators are not excluded.' "

The Senator from Tennessee voted to table the Monroney amendment. If he had made the threat that he would vote not to table, he would have succeeded in having his amendment adopted.

Senators have asked me to vote in favor of the bill. I simply cannot do it when I know that I would be driving the pegs which next January, when we meet again, will result in a proposal to increase the number of people qualifying under the law.

To my fellow citizens back in Ohio, I say that I favor the $1.25 proposal. I favor the expansion of the number of personnel covered under the legitimate constitutional provisions. That could have been done by the Monroney amendment. There would have been 3,800,000 covered under that amendment, as distinguished from 4 million under the bill as it came before us.

To my fellow citizens, I say that I cannot subscribe to this type of operation. I do not want to be in the position, in 1961 and 1962, when we shall meet again, of having it said to me "The principle has been established. All businesses are covered by the law except those doing a volume of less than $1 million. But that amount will be reduced."

When the effort is made to reduce that amount, I do not want to have stripped myself, tonight, of my armor to fight that proposal when it comes before the Senate.

Reluctantly, I shall vote against the measure. I had intended to say that I would vote for it, hoping that the committee would rectify this wrong and adopt the Monroney amendment. I tried to rationalize the situation. Probably it would be more profitable to me politically, but I simply could not, in reason and in conscience, bring myself to the position where I would vote for the bill.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, 23 years ago the Senate was considering a court-packing proposal. The year was 1937. It was rolled back because there was a great response from the country that certainly registered with the Members of this body, even if it were not needed.

I was in the House at that time. I received many letters. They raised the inquiry: "How do you account for this action by the U.S. Senate?"

I said, "The accounting you will find in the hearts and minds and in the reverence of the little people of the country."

The House of Representatives had no jurisdiction over the bill. But I recall the letters that came to me then—letters scrawled on pieces of wrapping paper, letters that must have been written with stub pencils lifted out of comb cases, letters written on tables in humble kitchens.

I recall when one housewife wrote:

DEAR MR. DIRKSEN: Please don't let them pak the cort.

And she spelled the words "p-a-k" and "c-o-r-t." She could not spell very well, Mr. President, but in her heart was a great reverence for the fundamental institutions of this country.

And because of that great wellspring of reverence in the hearts of the people of the Nation, that proposed step never did eventuate.

Mr. President, that profound feeling is strong at all times in the hearts and minds of the people of America, because they understand what was meant when on sacred parchments it was written:

Remove not the ancient landmarks which your fathers have set.

Long ago, Mr. President, the Founding Fathers of this Nation set a great landmark. Next month will be the 173d anniversary of the signing of the Constitution and its utterance in the city of Philadelphia. When the Founding Fathers left Independence Hall, in Philadelphia, on that day, the wife of one of the delegates to the Convention said, "Dr. Franklin, what have you given us?" The great Franklin, venerable and wise, replied, "A republic, if you can keep it."

Since that time the great challenge has been whether in our time we shall be appropriate trustees and stewards for the people under the representative system of our republic.

Mr. President, that is why I shall vote against this bill. I shall not attempt to tell any of my colleagues on this side what is his duty or what is his responsibility. I must concern myself with attempting to discharge my own duty and my own responsibility as best I can. I shall vote against the bill because I will not vote to remove that ancient landmark. I will not do anything which would result in impairing the oldest written Constitution under God's canopy of heaven, because that Constitution is one of beautiful balance that accounts for the progress and well-being of our great country, the greatest country on the face of the earth.

How beautifully did the Founding Fathers consummate that Constitution—first, as between the large States and the small States. We are aware of the fight which occurred in the convention between the delegates from Rhode Island and the delegates from Virginia, between the delegates from Delaware and the delegates from Massachusetts. How was that difficulty resolved? It was resolved by the creation of two legislative bodies, instead of one. The Founding Fathers provided for establishment of the Senate, in which each State would have two Members; and the Founding Fathers provided that the representation of a State in the Senate could not be decreased, except by consent of the State concerned.

Then, Mr. President, the Founding Fathers set up the House of Representatives on a popular and numerical basis.

Then in the Constitution they provided that no law could be consummated until it had the approval, not of one of the legislative bodies, but of both. That provision was one of the balancing provisions included in the Constitution.

The Founding Fathers provided for a 6-year term for each of the Members of this body, and they made it a continuing body—although some disagree. They provided for a 4-year term for the Chief Executive of the Nation, and for a 2-year term for the Members of the House of Representatives. They did that because they also gave the Members of the House of Representatives the right to pass revenue-raising bills, and, thus, the right to place great burdens upon the people. Therefore, by means of the provision for a 2-year term for each Member of the House of Representatives, the Founding Fathers gave the people an early opportunity to remove their Members of the House of Representatives from office, if they chose to do so.

The Founding Fathers also provided in that great instrument that bills passed by both Houses of Congress would not go into effect until they received the written approval of the President of the United States. It was provided that if he approved a bill, he would have to sign it; that if he did not approve a bill, he could return it, without his signature, to the Congress, along with a veto message; and, under the Constitution, thereafter the Congress would consider whether it would support or whether it would override the President's veto.

Another of the provisions was that even though the Congress passed a bill and the President signed it, if perchance the bill circumvented the Constitution, such a legislative measure could be rendered unconstitutional and null and void. That provision of the Constitution was made under the guidance of the great John Marshall, one of the great Chief Justices of the Supreme Court of our Nation.

Always, Mr. President, a fine balance was preserved by means of all those provisions.

Other balances were also provided for. The Founding Fathers included in the Constitution a provision that certain powers, but no more, are delegated to the Central Government. Those powers are the only ones the Central Government has. This Government has no power or authority except that given it by the Founding Fathers in 1787. They set limits. They said that all powers other than those expressly delegated by the Constitution to the Federal Government are reserved to the States, and to the people. That express provision was set forth in the Constitution because of suspicion. They knew what had happened in the Old World. They knew the history of kingship and the history of divine right and the history of dictatorship. So they said, "We reserve these powers to the States, and to the people." As a result, the only powers the Central Government enjoys are the specific ones written out in language which one can read and understand. Those powers, and no more, are delegated to the Central Government.

The suspicions of those who wrote the Constitution were well founded, Mr. President. When we consider the number of countries that have gone down to obscurity and dreamless dust, we realize very clearly how well those who wrote our Constitution did their work.

Mr. President, is there any better laboratory, is there any better experiment station for government, than at the grass roots, where the people are close to it—not 1,000 miles away, not 2,000 miles away, but so close that they can keep the Government fully responsible?

In the course of all that contriving—inspired, as I believe—the Founding Fathers wrote a commerce clause. They provided that the Federal Government should have power to regulate commerce between the States. That provision has been respected from that day virtually to this generation. But now we are beginning to see that provision eroded; we are beginning to see it leached away.

Is an uprising on the part of the people required—a quiet uprising, without force, without violence—in order to roll back the things we do?

Let me give an example: Under the skilled tutelage of lobbyists and the forces which were operative at that time, the 18th amendment was written into the Constitution of the United States. That was the first time that a stop-and-go signal was erected, not against Government, but against the people. Until that time, every amendment to our Constitution was in the nature of a warning to the Government: "Thus far, but no farther."

Jefferson came back; and in 1789 he urged and pushed for the Bill of Rights. The Bill of Rights does not provide that the people shall do this or shall do that. Instead, the Bill of Rights provides that the Congress shall make no law respecting the abridgement of freedom. No inhibitions were placed on the people. Instead, the inhibitions were placed on the Government. When we departed from that pattern, and included the 18th amendment, and provided that there should be no transportation of beverages, and that sort of thing, that amendment lasted for a while; but it is no longer in the Constitution, because the people, by their own vote and because of their own discernment, finally took it out.

That was the one classic time when, instead of placing inhibitions upon Government, we placed them on the people; and they repealed it as a result of the force and influence that they exercised in every corner of the land to bring to an end that restriction upon their liberties.

That is the beautiful balance we have, and today we are trifling with it. One need only read the language of this bill to be disturbed. It is not a question, with me, of $1.15 or $1.05 or $1.25. That is not my concern. I can go along with almost any money amount. I like the original approach between employer and employee, but we go infinitely further.

Then we have this amazing definition in the bill:

"Activity affecting commerce" includes any activity, business, or industry in commerce or necessary to commerce or to the production of goods for, or the distribution of goods in, commerce.

I say to you, Mr. President, that when the committee print was before us in committee it went further than that, because it contained language which referred to "Goods that were in competition with goods in commerce." That is the next step.

The distinguished Senator from Massachusetts, in his opening speech on this bill, said, "This is but one step." I read it into the RECORD. I ask, What is the next step? I do not know. I do not know what sentiment will prevail. But I know how I was raised. I know what my sentiment is, and I still subscribe to the ancient truth, "Remove not the ancient landmarks which your fathers have set." The Constitution is a landmark. It is responsible for the progress, the growth, the well-being of this country, and it has been adequate in every generation.

Is there a country in the world that can boast the equivalent of what we have enjoyed? Is there a country that can boast for its citizens the well-being our citizens enjoy? Take an airplane ride. Go east, go north, go west, go south. Look down out of a window from 10,000 feet up. See the automobiles. See the locomotives and trains transporting goods and commodities. See the smokestacks evidencing commercial activity. All that is done in the great moral climate of freedom. Then one can understand what this document means, because it was a charter of liberty designed to safeguard and protect the freedom of the individual and to keep government at bay.

Now we propose to modify the definition. There are little refinements. My distinguished friend from Minnesota talked for a moment about $1.25 being not too much. I do not quarrel with that premise. What I quarrel with is that this is the first step on a tortuous road which at long last will be followed by other enactments. Even as the distinguished Senator from Massachusetts said, "This is the first step" or "this is one step."

Where do we go from there? I remember a distinguished Member of this body. Some of my colleagues must have known him. I know that Senator HAYDEN knew him well. Senator GREEN, Senator ROBERTSON, Senator BRIDGES, and perhaps others knew him. His name was J. Hamilton Lewis, a man renowned for pink whiskers and colored weskits, and altogether a man so devoted to sartorial elegance that his name became almost a byword in that field.

I shall never forget the night, since we were living at the same hotel, when he came up and said—and this was a great flattery—"How is my Republican leader?" I was a humble, obscure Member of the House of Representatives in those days. Then, after the usual pleasantries, we sat down and visited. I shall never forget the occasion, about a year before he died, when he said, "My boy, I will never live to see it, but perhaps you will live to see when we shall erase State lines, so that they will become nothing more than convenient geographical boundaries on the maps issued at the gasoline filling stations. They will be only for the convenience of tourists, but beyond that they will have no significance, because the accretions to power in the central government in your lifetime will be such that, for practical purposes, they will be centralized and bureaucratic, and all things will be operated from Washington."

Thomas Jefferson was a great landmark. Did not he say, "When we determine from here when you shall sow and when you shall reap, that will be the end of the people's liberty"?

Mr. President, how blithely, how casually, we accept the language which has been brought to this floor in the committee bill. What does it mean? It is another step, and I am deeply distressed about it. I am for a minimum wage bill. I want to improve it. I want to advance it. I want to increase the wage and increase the coverage wherever we can. But shall we do it at the expense of that document which has been the charter of our liberties and the great motive force for the progress of this country?

I am afraid so. There is no use in laboring the point any further. I do not know what is going to happen in the conference. Unless all signs fail, I shall be a member of the conference committee, I say very frankly that if I am on the conference, I will do my best to bring about the kind of measure that I introduced as a substitute, to have a proper regard for the commerce jurisdiction of the country and for the jurisdiction of the respective States. I shall have a proper regard for the little people who are struggling to keep their businesses on the black side of the ledger.

When we took action today we did so hastily. We took care of all the hotels, the restaurants, the motels, and related businesses. We took care of the cocktail lounges, the bartenders, and others. Have we ever thought about it? Those are interesting implications in this bill. Perhaps there are others for whom proper provision should be made.

There is an answer to it. We should not go down this road. We should not destroy the commerce clause. We should preserve the delicacy, the sweetness, the greatness, and the virility of our Federal-State system, which has worked so well.

This is an eventful step tonight, Mr. President. Often we rise on the floor to say, "This is probably the most important thing on which we have balloted in 50 years." I do not say that. I merely say that this is a decisive moment, because involved is a further erosion of the commerce clause, for which every Member in this body has a responsibility.

When I held up my hand twice in the Senate and eight times in the House of Representatives and took the oath to uphold and defend the Constitution, I regarded it as a sacred obligation, according to my lights and according to my talents, and I mean to do it.

Mr. President, public office does not mean everything to me. I do not have to be in the Senate. I am grateful for the opportunity I have had to serve, but I do not believe that my people, when they understand the full import of what is before us, expect me to forfeit my convictions merely because there might be a little political mileage involved.

I believe it was Edmund Burke who said, when he was a member of the House of Commons:

> It is my duty to confer with my constituents, to talk with them, to reason with them, to gather wisdom for them.

But it was his judgment in the House of Commons, from which our own House of Representatives is a lineal descendant, which had to be made. He said:

> That is an individual judgment I have to make for myself.

For myself tonight, Mr. President, as I contemplate the language in the bill, I shall make that individual judgment for myself. I do not urge it on any other Member of this body. I simply say I cannot go down that road, because I still believe there is virtue and wisdom in that which the ancients wrote upon the parchments:

> Remove not the ancient landmark, which thy fathers have set.

Mr. President, I have done.

Mr. ELLENDER. Mr. President, I ask the indulgence of the Senate for a few minutes. The distinguished senior Senator from Alabama [Mr. HILL] and I are the only two Senators who served on the Committee on Labor and Public Welfare of the Senate when the so-called Fair Labor Standards Act of 1938 was enacted. I am the only remaining Member of the Senate who served on the conference committee which finally drafted the so-called Fair Labor Standards Act of 1938.

At the time the act was placed on the statute books many of us felt it might be unconstitutional. Many of us felt the commerce clause was being abused by the enactment of such a law. I know I speak for myself, and I believe none of us ever expected the Supreme Court would go so far in its interpretations of the provisions of the act as to decide which employees were engaged in commerce and engaged in the production of goods for commerce.

I bow to no man in the Senate in my efforts to help the working man. I voted for all proposed legislation which would inure to the benefit of the working man. What the Congress had in mind when the Fair Labor Standards Act was put on the statute books in 1938 was to do away with sweatshops. We held hearings for 6 or 7 months, as I recall, before the bill was enacted into law. We learned of cases not only in the South but also in Massachusetts and in all parts of the country, in which laboring men were paid as little as 10 or 15 cents an hour. The purpose of the act was to do away with sweatshops.

We have gone far afield from the original purpose of those who worked on and voted for the Fair Labor Standards Act. In its interpretations as to which employees are engaged in commerce or in the production of goods for commerce, I repeat, the Supreme Court has gone far afield.

As I pointed out last week in the debate, the Supreme Court decided that when a small printer in a community printed letterheads on paper to be used by a merchant to write to someone in an adjoining State, in order to buy goods or in order to sell goods, because of the fact that the letter and the envelope were used in interstate commerce in soliciting trade, the little printer who did the printing came within the purview of the act.

There was another farfetched decision which dealt with a man who owned a small gravel pit, from which he produced gravel and sand. Because the gravel and sand were used on a road which connected two States and automobiles went from one State to another State on the road, the Supreme Court decided that the producer of the gravel came within the purview of the act, and he was obliged to pay the amount fixed, and also the overtime.

Mr. President, the Supreme Court went so far as to place under the act a small sawmill operator who sold timber to a retailer who in turn sold it to the State highway commission. The timber was used to construct a bridge across a small stream, and the bridge was used by traffic from one State to another. The producer of that timber then came within the purview of the act.

Mr. President, it is my fear, as I stated a few days ago, that if we enlarge the law to provide than an employer who is engaged in a business affecting commerce is covered, the Supreme Court will declare that any business, no matter how big or small, which is not specifically exempted under the law, comes within the purview of the act.

In my judgment, the bill degrades the commerce clause, and I will not be a party to it. For that reason, and for the reasons I stated previously, I shall vote against the bill.

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, I shall not detain the Senate in order to state my reasons for supporting the bill, for which I will vote, but I should like to have the attention of the chairman of the Committee on Labor and Public Welfare because I should like to make a request that should be made a part of the record before we vote. Many of us, including myself, voted for the exemption of hotel workers, motel workers, and restaurant employees. Whatever may be the justification for such action, I think it was fully justified under the circumstances. I am nevertheless concerned about the full effect of this bill when it is signed into law, as I hope it will be, and when it goes into operation. Therefore I should like to address a request to the chairman of my committee, and if he can comply with it, I think it will be helpful.

I should like to request that the committee—and if the committee will not do so I shall, but I hope the committee will—ask the Department of Labor to give us at the earliest possible date next year a complete report as to the effect of such new Minimum Wage Act as is enacted upon hotel, motel, and restaurant employees. We wish to be fair in respect to these matters. I believe that to have such information before us will be helpful in two ways: First, to correct inequities, if any are found to exist on the facts; second, as a stimulus perhaps in helping to see that there is none. I make that suggestion to my chairman.

Mr. HILL. Such information might be very helpful. Certainly I know of no reason why the committee should not be able to obtain such facts from the Department of Labor.

Mr. JAVITS. I thank the Senator. I think the information will help us to deal with this subject, which may have to be dealt with and well considered.

Whatever may be the reasons of individual Senators for voting as they did, however they may feel about having made concessions upon individual items in order to have enacted a measure of critical importance, I think, to the economy of the country, and likewise to individuals, unless some concerted majority is willing to take action, nothing is likely to be done, and those of us who have an active part must bear the burden of the responsibilities and decisions.

I think support of the bill was the proper action to take under the circumstances, and I feel that with the facts before us, if there are any inequities or injustices which have been created, those of us who feel as I do may do our utmost to correct them, though we hope very much that such action may not be necessary.

Mr. STENNIS. Mr. President, I ask the indulgence of the Senate for a few minutes. I think there should be placed in the RECORD for anyone who may wish to pursue the subject, the sole authority we have to enact legislation on this subject. The basic authority is a very brief clause taken from section 7 of article I of the Constitution of the United States, which is a grant of power to Congress. It reads as follows:

> To regulate commerce with foreign nations, and among the several States, and with the Indian tribes.

The main part of the bill, of course, is based upon the language "to regulate commerce among the several States."

On page 2, lines 5 and 6 of the bill, we have stretched out that authority with the following quotation to mean "engaged in activities affecting commerce."

Without any further grant of power, we then go on to define at the bottom of page 3, line 25:

> (s) "Activity affecting commerce" includes any activity, business, or industry in commerce or necessary to commerce or to the production of goods for, or the distribution of goods in, commerce.

Quoting further:

> (t) "Enterprise engaged in an activity affecting commerce" means any of the following which is engaged in any activity affecting commerce:
> (1) any such enterprise which has one or more retail or service establishments if the annual gross volume of sales of such enterprise is not less than $1,000,000, exclusive of excise taxes.

In other words, we might take the criteria of $1 million of volume of trade and say to a clerk in a retail store who might sell a pair of shoes or a commodity which was produced in that same community that we are regulating such sale under the Constitution as being a part of commerce among States. The clerk who works in the store which has a $1 million business would be covered by the bill, but the clerk in the store next door which does not have as much as $1 million of business would not be covered under the law. I could not think of any example that could more graphically illustrate how far afield we have wandered from the guidelines of the Constitution of the United States. Still in so doing we use over and over the argument that we are protecting or bringing people under protection. Under the protection of what? We say we are giving them coverage. My interpretation is that the Constitution of the United States protects everyone, and it is a mere sham through a misuse of words to so abuse—I say that with all deference—the Constitution of the United States under the guise of protecting anyone. I think that example illustrates clearly how far afield we have wandered.

If the bill becomes law and is approved by the court, I cannot as a lawyer see a single vestige of any distinction that is left between the States and the United States. I believe the bill goes all the way and crosses the last bridge from which there will be no return. I say with all due deference that it is ironical that the men who are elected to represent States of the United States should invade the provinces of the States from which they were elected to the extent that we obliterate the States and read them out of the Constitution.

Mr. ROBERTSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. STENNIS. I yield to the Senator from Virginia.

Mr. ROBERTSON. Is it not true that Thomas Jefferson, the founder of the majority party in the Senate today, in referring to the 10th amendment and other provisions of the Constitution, said that all powers not delegated to the National Government nor prohibited to the States were reserved to the States or the people thereof, and he said that if the Constitution be construed as a single document and the Congress had the power to do whatever it thought was good for the Nation, Congress would be the sole judge of what was good, and it would confer upon Congress to do unlimited evil?

Mr. STENNIS. The Senator has spoken wisely and well, and certainly far better than I could express myself. I repeat, Mr. President, there is a desire that everyone prosper economically. But to stretch this clause of the Constitution to offer some people what they are not entitled to, is not only unsound legislation, but it is dangerous and destructive. As certain as we meet tonight, through this economic door—and this has nothing to do with civil rights or many other subjects in the Constitution—we are tearing down the structure upon which this Government is based, the basic authority on which we are supposed to act.

As a great man from New England once asked, "Once we tear down these pillars, who shall build them back?"

Mr. ERVIN. Mr. President, I expect to vote against the pending bill because I cannot reconcile it with the commerce clause in the Constitution, which gives Congress the only power it has to regulate matters of this kind. I cannot reconcile with anything in the commerce clause the provision I read from lines 4, 5, 6, 21, 22, 23, and 24 on page 4, and lines 1, 2, 3, 4, and 5, on page 5 of the bill:

"Enterprise engaged in an activity affecting commerce" means any of the following which is engaged in any activity affecting commerce:

* * * * *

(4) any establishment, not included in an enterprise described in paragraph (1), (2), or (3) of this subsection, which has one or more employees engaged in commerce or in the production of goods for commerce if the annual gross volume of sales of such establishment is not less than $250,000 (or $350,000 in the case of an establishment engaged in the business of construction or reconstruction, or both), exclusive of excise taxes at the retail level which are separately stated.

The only power Congress has to enact this provision into law in any respect is the power it derives from the provision of the Constitution that Congress may regulate commerce among the States. Yet here is an illustration of what Thomas Jefferson warned against when he said, in substance, that the Federal Government was the thief of jurisdiction.

Upon the premise that one employee in an establishment is engaged in interstate commerce or in the production of goods for interstate commerce, Congress undertakes to bring within its regulatory power an entire establishment which is engaged, with the exception of the work of the one employee, in intrastate commerce.

Furthermore, I cannot possibly reconcile the power of Congress to regulate what are essentially local activities, on the basis that they are activities affecting commerce.

It may be well to remember that if we can regulate the activities of citizens of the United States on the theory that those activities affect interstate commerce, Congress is not confined in its regulation of activities affecting commerce to those which deal only with the minimum wage or the working hours of persons who occupy the position of employees of others; rather, Congress can regulate every activity which affects commerce.

If the courts sustain the power of Congress to regulate certain activities on the basis that they are activities which affect commerce, then the States of this Nation can be destroyed by Congress, the Constitution of the United States to the contrary notwithstanding.

Even apart from the question of constitutionality, there remains a practical question. Even if we had the power, should we exercise the power to let Congress regulate what are essentially local activities? Is that wise? Is it wise for us to say that we have such a superior knowledge and wisdom as compared with State legislatures that we should regulate upon the national level what are essentially local activities and what is essentially intrastate commerce, as distinguished from interstate commerce? I cannot give my approval to that course of conduct.

I believe the best description of the purposes of the Constitution of the United States, set forth in a nutshell, was that given by Chief Justice Salmon P. Chase, in the great case of Texas against White, when he said that the Constitution in all of its provisions looks to an indestructible Union composed of indestructible States.

I believe that bills of this kind have a direct impact upon our system of government, because they tend to destroy the States.

I cannot escape the conviction that Justice Brandeis was correct when he said:

The States are the only breakwater against the ever pounding surf which threatens to submerge the individual and destroy the only society in which personality can exist.

For this reason, and because of my consciousness that liberty cannot survive the centralization of governmental power on the Washington level, I shall cast my vote against the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is, Shall the bill pass? The yeas and nays have been ordered, and the clerk will call the roll.

The Chief Clerk called the roll.

Mr. MANSFIELD. I announce that the Senator from Montana [Mr. MURRAY] and the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. O'MAHONEY] are absent on official business.

I also announce that the Senator from Missouri [Mr. HENNINGS] is absent because of illness.

I further announce that, if present and voting, the Senator from Missouri [Mr. HENNINGS], the Senator from Montana [Mr. MURRAY], and the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. O'MAHONEY] would each vote "yea."

Mr. KUCHEL. I announce that the Senator from Iowa [Mr. MARTIN] is absent by leave of the Senate on official business.

The result was announced—yeas 62, nays 34, not voting 4, as follows:

NOT VOTING—4

Hennings	Murray	O'Mahoney

So the bill (H.R. 12677) was passed.

The title was amended, so as to read: "To amend the Fair Labor Standards Act of 1938, as amended, to provide coverage for employees of large enterprises engaged in retail trade or service and of other employers engaged in activities affecting commerce, to increase the minimum wage under the Act to $1.25 an hour, and for other purposes."

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I move that the Senate reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed.

Mr. HUMPHREY. Mr. President, I move to lay that motion on the table.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, I move that the Senate insist upon its amendments, request a conference with the House thereon, and that the Chair appoint the conferees on the part of the Senate.

The motion was agreed to; and the Presiding Officer (Mr. CANNON in the chair) appointed Mr. KENNEDY, Mr. MCNAMARA, Mr. MORSE, Mr. RANDOLPH, Mr. GOLDWATER, Mr. DIRKSEN, and Mr. PROUTY conferees on the part of the Senate.

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, I ask that the bill as passed, with amendments, be printed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Without objection, Senate bill 3758 is indefinitely postponed.

STABILIZATION OF MINING OF LEAD AND ZINC ON PUBLIC, INDIAN, AND OTHER LANDS

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Calendar No. 1883, H.R. 8860.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be stated by title.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. A bill (H.R. 8860) to stabilize the mining of lead and zinc by small domestic producers on public, Indian, and other lands, and for other purposes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Texas.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate proceeded to consider the bill.

LEGISLATIVE PROGRAM

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, tomorrow it is desired to have the Senate consider the following measures:

Calendar No. 1883, H.R. 8860, to stabilize the mining of lead and zinc by small domestic producers on public, Indian, and other lands, and for other purposes. This bill has been made the unfinished business.

I am informed that no serious controversy is expected, although there is some controversy. But I am informed that there will be no extended debate on that bill.

Then we expect to take up Calendar No. 1908, Senate bill 2855, increasing the authorization for appropriations for the President's mutual security contingency fund. That bill was reported unanimously, I believe, by the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Then we expect to take up Calendar No. 1910, Senate bill 3861, providing for assistance in the development of Latin America and in the reconstruction of Chile, in accordance with the President's recommendations.

Then we expect to take up Calendar No. 1654, Senate bill 2917, to establish a price-support level for milk and butterfat.

Then we expect to take up Calendar No. 1752, House bill 5068, to amend the Shipping Act of 1916, to provide for licensing independent foreign freight forwarders.

I do not mean to say that those bills will necessarily be considered in the order in which they have been announced; but we shall try to have the chairman of the committees handling them placed on notice that we expect to bring up those bills tomorrow by motion.

In the event we can conclude our action on those measures tomorrow, and in the event we cannot receive the report from the Finance Committee on tomorrow, we shall not hold a session on Saturday, because the Finance Committee will meet early in the morning, to try to get out the report—which was voted on by it last Saturday—on the medical aid bill. As soon as the bill is reported and as soon as the report is printed, we expect to bring up the bill by motion, and to continue its consideration until we conclude our action on it, unless we have an appropriation bill.

I understand the mutual security bill will be marked up tomorrow. If so, I wish to give notice now that as soon as we can obtain consent or as soon as we can bring up the bill by motion, under the rule, we shall bring it up by motion.

I think it very unlikely that we shall have a Saturday session. I cannot state positively now that we shall not have one; but if we are able to conclude our action on these bills tomorrow and if the medical care bill is not reported tomorrow, we shall go over from tomorrow until Monday. I shall try to inform the Senate as early tomorrow as I can in regard to a Saturday session; but I will say now that I believe the odds against holding any session at all on Saturday are very heavy, because it is not likely that the Finance Committee will complete its action tomorrow.

During the remainder of the session tonight we do not expect any action of a voting nature to be taken.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, let me ask when the majority leader expects to have the session tomorrow convene.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. At 10 o'clock.

Mr. DIRKSEN. In view of the measures to be considered tomorrow in accordance with the announcement which has been made, and in view of the fact that only one of them, I believe, is controversial, it would seem to me that we could convene a little later, because I am of the opinion that those measures can be disposed of by a reasonably early hour tomorrow.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. In that event we can conclude the session tomorrow a little earlier. I believe that all Members would like to have a long weekend, if possible.

I have no desire to object to the suggestion the Senator from Illinois has made. If he prefers to have the Senate convene tomorrow at 10:30, we shall do so. But I wish to have final action taken on these bills and I wish to have us get as much of the program behind us as possible.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Delaware. Mr. President, will the Senator from Texas yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I yield.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Delaware. I notice that the bill which the majority leader has made the unfinished business was reported by the Finance Committee. I know that the chairman of the Finance Committee has scheduled a meeting for tomorrow morning at 10 o'clock. The arrangement proposed for the Senate session tomorrow would conflict with that.

I wonder whether some other bill can be considered first, on tomorrow. If not, of course we shall adjust ourselves to the will of the majority leader. But I know the meeting to which I have referred is scheduled for 10 o'clock tomorrow morning.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. At the beginning of the session tomorrow, we shall have a morning hour. Suppose we wait to see whether we can obtain an agreement. At any rate, I appreciate the Senator's cooperation. If it is found that there is difficulty, we can see how we proceed following the morning hour, if it is not long.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, I would appreciate it if the Senator from Texas would ask that the session on tomorrow convene at 10:30, instead of 10 o'clock.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Very well. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Texas.

ORDER FOR ADJOURNMENT UNTIL 10:30 A.M. TOMORROW

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that when the Senate concludes its deliberations today, it stand in adjournment until 10:30 a.m. tomorrow.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I thank my friend for his suggestion. I hope he anticipates correctly that we shall not encounter any delay in connection with the consideration of these bills. If not, we shall be able to end the session tomorrow at an early hour, and then return on Monday for the debate on the medical aid bill.

I desire to thank all Members of the Senate for their cooperation, and particularly for their diligent attention which has enabled us to make this much progress this week.

ORDER OF BUSINESS

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, will the Senator from Texas yield to me?

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I yield.

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, I have withheld until following the final yea-and-nay vote on the minimum wage bill certain remarks which I wish to make. It will take me about 10 minutes to make them.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Then, Mr. President, I yield the floor, so that the Senator from Oregon may be recognized.

Mr. MORSE. Before making my statement, Mr. President, I shall be glad to permit other Senators to submit items for the RECORD.

BERNARD BARUCH DAY—AUGUST 18, 1960

Mr. THURMOND. Mr. President, it was my pleasure on August 16 to attend ceremonies in Lafayette Park commemorating the 90th birthday of the distinguished elder statesman, Mr. Bernard M. Baruch. The occasion also marked the 50th anniversary of the founding of the Boy Scouts of America. It was in recognition of the dedicated selfless service of this outstanding American that the Commissioners of the District of Columbia proclaimed August 16 as "Bernard Baruch Day."

Mr. President, it was on this occasion that Mr. Baruch's favorite Lafayette Park bench was dedicated as "The Bernard Baruch Bench of Inspiration," which was commemorated with a bronze plaque which cites Mr. Baruch "for his inspiring devotion to country and distinguished service to boyhood," and points out that both the Boy Scout motto and Mr. Baruch's oft-repeated philosophy are "Be Prepared."

It was with a particular sense of pride that I attended these ceremonies, for Mr. Baruch is a native South Carolinian. Since his birth in Camden, S.C., he has achieved notable success in many fields; but his accomplishments in the financial and political fields have earned him the well-deserved reputation of financial genius, statesman, and adviser to Presidents. His service in various governmental capacities dates back to 1916, when President Woodrow Wilson appointed him a member of the Advisory Commission to the Committee of National Defense.

Mr. President, it was entirely fitting and proper that the National Capital Area Council of the Boy Scouts of America sponsored this event, for Mr. Baruch has been deeply devoted to the development of the minds and bodies of the young people of this Nation.

It was particularly appropriate that at the ceremony both Mr. Baruch, the outstanding park-bench sage, and the Boy Scouts of America should be commemorated. This organization is to be commended for the matchless contribution it has made to the development of our Nation's boyhood, the future citizens and leaders of our country.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have included as a part of my remarks, the proclamation by the Commissioners of the District of Columbia declaring August 16 as "Bernard Baruch Day."

There being no objection the proclamation was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

A PROCLAMATION BY THE COMMISSIONERS OF THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA DESIGNATING AUGUST 16, 1960, AS "BERNARD BARUCH DAY"

Whereas the National Capital Area Council of the Boy Scouts of America and the Scouts national headquarters have selected Tuesday, August 16, 1960, to honor Elder Statesman Bernard M. Baruch; and

Whereas the 90th birthday of this distinguished American occurs later that week, on Friday, August 19—during the 50th anniversary year of the founding of the Boy Scouts of America; and

Whereas Mr. Baruch's favorite Lafayette Park bench will be dedicated as "The Bernard Baruch Bench of Inspiration" and will be commemorated with a bronze plaque which cites Mr. Baruch "for his inspiring devotion to country and distinguished service to boyhood," and which points out that both the Boy Scout motto and Mr. Baruch's oft-repeated philosophy are "Be Prepared"; and

Whereas it is hoped that young people, in particular, will receive inspiration from sitting on this bench in the future, as Mr. Baruch has over the years; and

Whereas we also wish to salute the Boy Scouts of America in their golden anniversary year for the matchless contribution which scouting has lent to the development of our Nation's boyhood, the future citizens and leaders of our country—a cause to which our senior citizen, Mr. Baruch, has been deeply devoted: Now, therefore

We, the Commissioners of the District of Columbia, do take this means of extending a warm welcome to Mr. Bernard M. Baruch by declaring Tuesday, August 16, 1960, "Bernard Baruch Day" in the Nation's Capital. In offering sincere congratulations on his forthcoming 90th birthday, we wish Mr. Baruch many more years of happy, meaningful life and we hope that the country he loves so dearly may continue to benefit from his dedicated, selfless service.

ROBERT E. MCLAUGHLIN,
F. J. CLARKE,
Commissioners of the District of Columbia.

THE WELFARE AND PENSION PLANS DISCLOSURE ACT OF 1958

Mr. DOUGLAS. Mr. President, I desire to call the attention of the Members of the Senate to an editorial entitled "Safeguarding Pensions," which was published in the Washington Post of August 15, 1960. The editorial refers to a recent Department of Labor report covering the first 18 months of operation of the Welfare and Pension Plans Disclosure Act passed in 1958. I ask unanimous consent to have the editorial printed at this point in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Washington Post, Aug. 15, 1960]

SAFEGUARDING PENSIONS

Experience has confirmed the views freely expressed when the Welfare and Pension Plans Disclosure Act was passed in 1958 to the effect that it would prove wholly inadequate. Its shortcomings have now been demonstrated and documented in a careful report by the Department of Labor, Secretary Mitchell adds to that report the comment that "to continue the law in its present form in the belief that it assures adequate safeguards is a shameful illusion."

The importance of the problem is indicated by the fact that more than $30 billion has been accumulated in pension and welfare funds for protection of the country's wage earners. Congress found that some of these funds were being looted and frittered away and sought to safeguard them. But the disclosure requirements it set up were to be enforced through court proceedings brought by individual employees. Only one lawsuit of this sort has been reported, although violations of the act are said to run into many thousands.

The Labor Department has not been able to cope with the continued abuses because it was denied authority to compel full and honest reports, to conduct investigations and to prosecute violations of the act. When deficient reports are filed, the Department may point out their defects if they are obvious, but its advice may be ignored with impunity. "For all practical purposes," Secretary Mitchell complains, he is "powerless to uncover abuses."

President Eisenhower sought amendment of the act at the time he signed it and has since repeated his recommendations. It is now too late to expect action by the present Congress, but the bill for this purpose ought to have a prominent place on the agenda for next year.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Mr. President, it will be recalled that the Welfare and Pension Plans Disclosure Act provided for registration and annual reporting as to the operation and assets of these private plans, upon which some 80-odd million employees and dependents rely in some measure for their future security—plans whose assets now total over $30 billion.

The editorial points out that the shortcomings of the act have now been demonstrated and documented; and it quotes from the report:

To continue the law in its present form in the belief that it affords adequate safeguards is a shameful illusion.

It might well have added that the report also stated:

To abandon it [the law] entirely, however, would be an act of betrayal to the millions of Americans who have a right to a sense of security that the billions of dollars annually received and disbursed by these plans are being honestly and prudently managed.

The editorial further points out the inability of the Labor Department to cope with the continuing abuses under the present law, and states that "for all practical purposes, the Secretary of Labor is powerless to uncover abuses."

On the same day, Mr. President, the New York Times also printed an editorial on this subject, making several of the same points, which I further ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD at this point in my remarks.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the New York Times, Aug. 15, 1960]

OUR WEAK LABOR FUND LAW

Secretary of Labor Mitchell's report to Congress on the operation of the Welfare and Pension Plans Disclosure Act cites the record of 18 months' experience in its administration to demonstrate its glaring weaknesses. Clearly it should be drastically strengthened or wiped off the statute books. But, as Mr. Mitchell has said, to abandon it would be a betrayal of the millions of Americans who have a right to a sense of security in the way the billions of dollars in these funds are handled.

Fantastic as it may seem, the act—costing half a million dollars a year to administer—has no effective provisions for enforcement. Not only that but the means are lacking for binding interpretations of the law to guide those who are required by it to file reports. As a result of these manifest weaknesses, Mr. Mitchell charges, thousands of fund officials have not filed the descriptions they should, thousands more that have reported have not kept their reports up to date or have violated the law in the way they have reported.

The Labor Department lacks the power to investigate such shortcomings or to seek injunctions to compel compliance with the law or to restrain violations of it. Nor are there penalties in it for flagrant abuses which the reporting might reveal, such as embezzlement and "kickbacks." Specific amendments to the act designed to correct these deficiencies are provided in bills introduced in both Houses at the last session of Congress—Senator SCOTT's S. 2550 and Representative FRELINGHUYSEN's H.R. 7489.

We support Secretary Mitchell's plea for their "prompt and favorable consideration." It would be lamentable for this important item to remain "unfinished business" when this Congress adjourns.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Mr. President, these editorials are most timely as we consider the remedial legislation introduced in the Senate, for they prompt us to recall the effort which went into the passage of the Senate bill 2888 on April 28, 1958, the opposition it had, and the sources of that opposition.

It will be recalled that the bill, as originally passed by the Senate, after investigation and deliberation for a number of years, not only provided for across-the-board disclosure of the financial operation of these plans, but also provided an agency to administer and enforce the act, and also provided criminal penalties for willful violations of its requirements, for false entries, for embezzlement, for "kickbacks," and for bribery. As this bill was passed by the Senate, the bill had "a full set of teeth."

The Post editorial states that President Eisenhower sought amendment of the measure at the time when he signed the act, and has since repeated his recommendations; and the Department of Labor report emphasizes that the President and the administration have continuously attempted to have strengthening amendments added to the law.

However, I remember, as will other Members, that while the administration gave lipservice to passage of the bill, its actions in 1958 were quite to the contrary. Despite the stanch support of Senator Ives and a group of like-minded Members of his party for a broad, effective measure, the majority of the Senate Republicans fought for an amendment to knock out from the bill's coverage welfare and pension plans covering 90 percent of the beneficiaries of such plans. After that first attack was defeated, the administration then caused to be submitted a series of hamstringing amendments relating to the Taft-Hartley Act which had nothing to do with this vital welfare and pension-plans legislation.

It was only by herculean efforts on the part of the Democratic leadership and the manager of the bill, Senator

KENNEDY, in a debate which continued over a period of 5 days, that finally we were able to get a good bill. It is only necessary to refer to the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD between April 23 and April 28, 1958, to demonstrate that in the amendment to destroy 90 percent of the bill's coverage and in the numerous unrelated amendments which were voted on, the substantial opposition came entirely from the Republican side of the aisle. It was only after a dozen or more of these amendments had been defeated and the desperate need for such a bill had been proven so eloquently as to shame anyone from voting against it that in the final vote the bill was passed 88 to 0.

It will be sadly recalled what happened to the bill when it went to the House, and how without the experience which the Senate had with respect to the issues involved—and again with only lipservice from the administration—it was stripped of many of its most meaningful enforcement provisions.

A majority of the House Republican Labor Committee members concentrated on trying to exempt the great bulk of the plans and to delay action in 1958. Other opponents of any legislation joined to weaken the bill's enforcement sections, with no visible administration objections. The bill as emasculated by the House was somewhat improved in conference. But as the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. KENNEDY] reported to the Senate on August 16, 1958:

> Unfortunately, many Members of the other body preferred no bill at all to the bill which had been passed by the Senate. Therefore, the Senate conferees negotiated under considerable difficulties, for they recognized that if they did not agree to make substantial concessions, no bill at all would be enacted.

I state unequivocally that if the administration had given the bill in the House the support it professed to have for it, we would not now be laboring with this weak and inadequate legislation.

The administration does not need to tell us now—or after its initial passage—that the law needs amendments. We knew it then, and we also knew that if they had given any real support to this piece of legislation—which I believe is one of the most important measures to come before the Senate in recent years—the law would not be in its present state.

Those of us who sponsored and fought for an effective welfare and pension-plans disclosure bill then hoped that experience under the law as finally passed would furnish persuasive evidence of the need to restore its teeth. The Secretary of Labor's recent report is doubtless helpful—and I hope persuasive with those who needed persuading—in this respect.

While issuing it as he did only on August 8, the Secretary cannot realistically expect Congress in these short weeks to act on his recommendations, I fully support proposals to restore to the Welfare and Pension Plans Disclosure Act the enforcement provisions that were in the Senate bill and should have been in the law when passed in 1958.

As author of the original bill and chairman of the investigating committee whose findings led up to this law, I take more than a passing interest in making it more effective to protect the 80 million beneficiaries of these plans.

I am glad important newspapers like the Washington Post and New York Times support this effort to improve the law, and only hope the responsibility for its original weakness may be a little clearer as a result of my references to its legislative history.

END OF COBALT MINING IN IDAHO

Mr. CHURCH. Mr. President, last week, the Idaho Falls Post-Register carried the following news account:

HOUSES MOVED OUT OF COBALT

COBALT, August 11.—Three more houses made their exit from Cobalt last week. Rowley Construction Co., Preston, was engaged in moving the Nelson Folsome house to the Pahsimerol Valley. The M. K. Draine housemovers were engaged in moving the Leo Stine house to Salmon, where the Stines will make their home. Dale Hazelbaker & Sons were busy moving another unit of the Stunz housing project to Heyburn.

This brief local story evidences something more than the tragedy of an Idaho town's death throes—it evidences the tragic shortsightedness of the policies of this administration in assuring a healthy domestic mining industry.

For Cobalt, the name of the town from which the houses were being moved, is the name also of a metal of the highest strategic importance to the United States. Used from earliest recorded history to decorate glass, it was discovered in 1905 that its addition to highspeed steels improved the steel's resistance to wear at red-hot heats.

After World War II, cobalt-base cutting alloys have been used in making turbines, superchargers, and other high-heat components of jet technology; cobalt metal is used in thermo-elements, and metal-glass seals; it is important in making high-efficiency magnets for instruments; and cobalt salts are used extensively in the chemical and medical fields.

The largest cobalt mine in the United States was at Cobalt, Idaho. From 1952 until 1959 it was a major economic asset in the Lemhi County area of Idaho, with an annual payroll in Idaho of almost $2 million. With the mill and refinery which the mine owning company had in Utah, there was an investment in the operation of over $12 million.

In 1959, the economic catastrophe of total closing of this operation took place, when the Director of Office of Civil and Defense Mobilization denied to the company relief under section 8 of the Trade Agreements Extension Act. Previously, the Government had refused to renew the contract under which the Government had been purchasing and stockpiling the mine's cobalt output.

In asking for relief under the Trade Agreements Extension Act of 1958, the Howe Sound Co., for its subsidiary the Calera Mining Co., which operated the Idaho properties, asserted its belief that loss of the Idaho mine would be a threat to national security. It contended that the stockpiling laws were intended to supplement inaedquate domestic mineral production, not to supplant completely domestic production from going to domestic sources.

And, most significantly, it pointed out that our major offshore source of cobalt—Congo and Cuba—are vulnerable to political, economic, and military interference, making it unwise for this country to place full reliance on them for so important a mineral.

All the company's contentions were rejected. In his decision, Gov. Leo Hoegh, Director of the Office of Civil and Defense Mobilization, recognized that the Belgian Congo accounts for 64 percent of the free world cobalt production, through only one producer, the Union Miniere du Haut-Katanga.

As a major alternative source, Governor Hoegh referred to the Freeport Sulphur Co.'s operations in Cuba. He said:

> The potential resources of recoverable cobalt in Cuba may be as large as those of the Belgian Congo, but the cobalt content per ton of ore is much lower.

Governor Hoegh also opined in his denial of section 8 relief:

> Cobalt resources are becoming increasingly widespread geographically and politically, and denial of sources of supply increasingly unlikely. The U.S. market is essential to the producers. The capacity to produce cobalt in Africa and Canada and that expected from Cuba beginning late in 1959, indicates a continuing supply sufficient to meet the requirements of domestic economic growth.
> In the event of the disruption of African supply, Canadian production and domestic production of Bethlehem and National Lead, plus forthcoming Cuban production, could meet domestic industrial requirements on the 1953–57 average annual level of over 9 million pounds.

Mr. President, on August 15, the Associated Press carried the formal announcement of the long-expected intervention by the Castro government of the Freeport Sulphur Co.'s Moa Bay cobalt operation. I ask unanimous consent that the Associated Press dispatch carried by the Christian Science Monitor of August 15 may be included in my remarks at this point.

There being no objection, the dispatch was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

CUBA TAKES OVER NICKEL PLANT

HAVANA.—The Castro government has taken over the Freeport Sulphur Co.'s $75 million nickel and cobalt plant in Cuba. The American-owned plant has been idle since March, when the government put a heavy export tax on its output.

Announcement August 14 of government intervention of Freeport's Moa Bay Mining Co. heightened uneasiness in private business circles concerning the fate of about $75 million worth of other American mining properties still under private management.

President Dorticos announced the intervention—which can mean anything from token supervision to outright control—but gave no reason.

In New York, the Freeport company said it would take all possible steps under Cuban and international law to protect its legal rights.

The action against the Moa Bay Co. came a week after a government decree nationalizing more than $700 million worth of other American-owned properties in Cuba.

Chief among the other American-owned mining properties is the Nicaro nickel plant, which was built by the U.S. Government. Representatives of the U.S. General Services Administration and the Castro regime are still discussing sale of the plant to Cuba.

Mr. CHURCH. The tragic situation in the Congo needs no elaboration on my part, beyond saying that one important aspect of the unrest has been the cessation of all the mining and refining operations of the Union Miniere du Haut-Katanga.

In other words, our major overseas sources of cobalt are now cut off. For how long we do not know. Our major domestic source was closed a year ago. The equipment has been sold and hauled off. The work force has dispersed. And, as I noted at the outset, now the houses are going down the road, one by one.

Here, in one mineral, is the example of where our mineral policies are taking us. Not only in the case of cobalt, but in the case of lead and zinc in my own State, our domestic industry is being choked to death, while we remain oblivious to the disaster that may be over the horizon, after our supplies from abroad are cut off.

Mr. President, it is time we took another look at our mineral policies. I feel that the case of cobalt is an instructive lesson for us.

FAIR LABOR STANDARDS AMENDMENTS OF 1960

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, at this time I wish to pay tribute to several men who, for many months have helped with the fair labor standards amendments and, in recent days in the Senate, have been instrumental in its passage. I withheld these comments until after the vote because they do not deal with the legislative substance of the bill, and I did not wish to inconvenience any of my colleagues, who wanted to vote at the earliest possible hour so they could go home.

For the RECORD, I wish to make these comments because I think the RECORD should show that when this bill came to the Senate many months ago, it came as the Kennedy-Morse-Roosevelt bill. The Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. KENNEDY] and the Senator from Oregon were the joint authors of this bill in the Senate, and Representative JAMES ROOSEVELT, of California, introduced the companion bill in the House of Representatives.

I mention this fact because the bill is the result of cooperative effort. I have been in the Senate for 16 years. I have engaged in many major legislative battles in those 16 years, but I have never engaged in one in which I was associated with, and had associated with me, such a hard-working group of colleagues in the Congress as has been the case in connection with this bill. Those colleagues are deserving of the commendation and tribute which I wish to pay them for the record.

At the outset, let me say that I am greatly indebted to, and shall always be appreciative of, the comments made tonight by the Democratic whip, Senator MIKE MANSFIELD, of Montana. I thought he was generous. I would be less than human if I were not moved by his generosity. I appreciate the kind things he said about me. Even though I know that, in measure, they were not deserved, they nevertheless are pleasant to the ear, particularly when they come from a man for whom I have such high respect and regard as I have for MIKE MANSFIELD, of Montana. I do not return flattery for flattery when I say to the Senator from Montana that, as Democratic whip, he exercised a leadership in processing this bill to the Senate that may not be known to the general public. However, the legislative process requires a great deal of floor work, and the Senator from Montana [Mr. MANSFIELD] cooperated with those on the Labor and Public Welfare Committee who had the responsibility of putting the bill through the Senate, in connection with every request we made of him. I think the RECORD should show that in my judgment the bill would have passed in a much weaker form if it had not been for the able floor work of the Democratic whip, the Senator from Montana.

I turn now to pay a very deserved tribute to the majority leader and to the chairman of the Labor Subcommittee, the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. KENNEDY]. In my judgment, the majority leader, the Senator from Texas [Mr. JOHNSON], and the chairman of the Labor Subcommittee, the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. KENNEDY], one of the coauthors of this bill, performed most effective work in processing the bill through the Senate; and I think I use the word "processing" correctly in this instance.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. MORSE. I yield.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Do I correctly understand the Senator from Oregon to believe that the firm of JOHNSON and KENNEDY, or KENNEDY and JOHNSON, is a rather effective team?

Mr. MORSE. The team of KENNEDY and JOHNSON has demonstrated once again that they are very able leaders. They will fulfill the great need of America to enter the new frontier; and I am perfectly satisfied that under their leadership America will be led to greater heights than it has yet experienced.

Time and time again the majority leader and the chairman of the Labor Subcommittee, recognizing that certain segments of the bill were in trouble, so to speak, held conferences with those of us who had a common objective of trying to have passed the best possible minimum wage bill; and we followed their leadership and their advice. I pay my tribute to them for the magnificent leadership they extended in helping us put the bill through in as good a form as it finally emerged.

But, Mr. President, they could not have done it alone. There are others I wish to mention who were of particular help to me, and I know they were of help to Senator JOHNSON of Texas and Senator KENNEDY. They deserve the special attention I want to give them. I know it is risky when one attempts to do this, because he may omit some who ought to be mentioned. Nevertheless, because these hours of debate and consideration the last few days on the minimum wage bill have been very trying hours for all of us, I personally want the RECORD to show my public thanks to Senator HUBERT HUMPHREY, of Minnesota, who, when we needed him to come in and press an argument which he was well qualified to make, could always be counted on to take up the cudgels and make the argument.

Then, JOE CLARK, of Pennsylvania, held the floor here one afternoon in opposition to one of the most complicated amendments that was presented, and did a magnificent job, as he did on several other occasions during the debate.

JOHN CARROLL, of Colorado, in his speech last night, helped clarify the record on one of the most difficult legal points with which we were confronted during the course of the debate. I shall have more to say on this subject by way of an insertion in the RECORD later.

I pay tribute also to the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. WILLIAMS]. As the RECORD shows, there were a few hours during the debate when the Senator from Massachusetts was handicapped by loss of his voice, due to a throat soreness that has developed, and he could not take over the leadership on certain amendments. During part of that debate Senator WILLIAMS of New Jersey was pinch hitting for him with regard to the whole migratory worker issue. The Senator from New Jersey demonstrated very effectively that he is one of the best qualified men to speak on this topic. He had been conducting hearings across the country on the migratory labor problem, and the RECORD will show the brillance of his work the other afternoon, when we were confronted by an attempt on the part of the opponents of this bill, in effect, to do great injustice to the thousands and thousands of itinerant migratory workers. The Senator from New Jersey [Mr. WILLIAMS] deserves a great deal of thanks for the leadership he gave to the Senate in helping to defeat that amendment which, if passed, would have resulted in great social and economic injustice to thousands of exploited workers in our country.

I pay special tribute to the Senator from South Carolina, OLIN JOHNSTON. I hope I do not embarrass him, and I hope I shall not cause him injury. As a liberal, it was an inspiring thing for me to sit here and to see OLIN JOHNSTON, like the Rock of Gibraltar, unmoved by the pressures put upon him to vote against those sections of the bill which sought to raise the standards of many millions of people, more than 4 million people, which we brought under the coverage of the bill. I happen to know something about some of the pressure which was brought to bear upon the Senator from South Carolina. I have great respect for a person of such deep conviction who resists pressure when he knows those who are pressuring him are not justified.

Some of these votes were so close that, in my judgment, if the Senator from South Carolina, OLIN JOHNSTON, had left us, other Senators would have followed him and we would have lost the cause. Therefore, I pay special commendation to OLIN JOHNSTON.

Then there is that great liberal from Illinois, Senator PAUL DOUGLAS, who honors me by his presence in the Chamber at this moment. He once again demonstrated that nothing can deter him, nothing can sidetrack him, nothing can cause him ever to let down the great liberal cause in this country. This was a great liberal cause, because the bill raised once again the banner of constitutional liberalism on the floor of the Senate. I am always proud to be associated with PAUL DOUGLAS in a great cause such as that envisaged in the minimum wage bill. I thank him personally for his assistance.

There was also JENNINGS RANDOLPH, of West Virginia. There were times, I know, when JENNINGS RANDOLPH, of West Virginia, voted with us against certain amendments when forces in his State were urging him to vote for the amendments because of their selfish interests. Mr. President, the test is whether we can stand up against those forces in the public interest, and JENNINGS RANDOLPH did it time and time again in his votes on the bill.

There was also that dedicated liberal, who I am sure thrilled this Nation during the Democratic Convention by the great speech he made at Los Angeles. I think it was one of the finest nominating speeches I have ever heard or ever read at any convention of any party in the history of our country. I refer to GENE MCCARTHY, of Minnesota. Time and time again, as the RECORD will show, he came to our assistance and gave us yeoman help as we battled in opposition to amendments we knew would scuttle the bill if they succeeded in passing.

There was also that great debater from Rhode Island, JOHN PASTORE. Time and time again, with a few rapier thrusts, he went straight to the heart of the fallacious arguments presented by the opposition in the course of this debate. As a coauthor of this bill I thank the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. PASTORE].

I have thus far mentioned only those on this side of the aisle, but I shall always be nonpartisan enough and I shall always try to be fair enough to also express my thanks and appreciation for assistance I receive from Senators on the other side of the aisle. Time and time again the Senator from New York [Mr. JAVITS], a member of our committee, who had been of great assistance to us when the bill was before the committee, had the courage, as we always expect of him, to stand up on the other side of the aisle and support us in opposition to amendments which he knew would do irreparable damage to the objectives of the bill.

Associated with him was another Republican on the Labor and Public Welfare Committee, the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. CASE]. I thank the Senator from New Jersey for the assistance he gave us not only in the Senate but also in the committee. Mr. President, this bill was in the committee for a long time. It was not easy to have the bill reported by the committee. The Senator from New Jersey [Mr. CASE] was of great help to us on numerous occasions.

Although I disagreed with my good friend from Kentucky [Mr. COOPER] as to a couple of amendments, the RECORD is clear that on other amendments he, too, was of great assistance to the proponents of this bill, and I thank him for his help.

Mr. President, I have not exhausted the list of those who have been so helpful to us, so I now give a blanket thanks to all those who the RECORD will show battled with us shoulder to shoulder as we fought to protect the bill to the maximum extent possible as it came from the committee.

What was the final result? It was not as good as we would like, but, Mr. President, I am not so sure it is not better than we had a right to expect, when we consider the powerful coalition which was against us. I speak most respectfully of that coalition. I speak most respectfully of those who tonight before the vote spoke against the bill and explained why they were going to vote against the bill. I recognize their right to do so. I have no question as to their sincerity. I merely find myself on the opposite of the pole from their political philosophy.

Mr. President, it would not augur well for the future of America if that philosophy ever should take over, but I am confident that that philosophy is on the way out or is at least on the way to diminishment.

I am confident that the people of this country recognized, when we were fighting in connection with this bill for a dynamic application of the Constitution of the United States, when we were urging the philosophy of a Brandeis and a Cardozo and a great Holmes—yes, Mr. President, the philosophy of a John Marshall—that we were correct. I did not take the time during the course of the debate to discuss the constitutional philosophy of John Marshall, but that great Chief Justice from the State of Virginia, who wrote the famous Marbury versus Madison decision, which established beyond doubt the constitutional prerogative of the Supreme Court to interpret and apply the Constitution, did not share the limited view of the commerce clause of the Constitution of the United States which was promulgated in the debate by many of the southern Senators and also by some of those from the North, who took the position that the interstate commerce clause apparently must be looked upon as a straitjacket clause or a dead letter clause in the Constitution of the United States limited by the boundaries of a State.

Mr. President, this dynamic concept of the interstate commerce clause has been upheld by one Supreme Court decision after another. It is interesting to note that during the course of the debate not a single opponent of the bill brought forth a single decision to sustain his interpretation of the interstate commerce clause. Remarkably enough, the Supreme Court has for a long time recognized the commerce clause of the Constitution as a dynamic legal concept adaptable to and adjustable to an ever-changing economic order in this country. That is why I took the time today and last night in the debate to point out the consistent line of decisions of the Supreme Court in regard to the application of the interstate commerce clause. The Court has held over and over again that if a business substantially affects interstate commerce then the commerce clause is applicable. As I pointed out earlier, that is what the Congress itself, in legislation it has passed, has held. That is what the Congress itself underwrote when the National Labor Relations Act was passed in 1935, and amended by the Taft-Hartley Act in 1947.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. MORSE. I yield.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Is it not also true that at the time the Constitution was adopted, the term "commerce" had a very broad meaning in the American language?

Mr. MORSE. It did.

Mr. DOUGLAS. It referred not merely to the actual movement of commodities, but also to economic activity as a whole?

Mr. MORSE. It did, I am quite sure.

Mr. DOUGLAS. There was a very thorough discussion on that subject by Walton Hale Hamilton many years ago, and by Professor Croskey, of the University of Chicago Law School. In their very thorough examination of the usage of the term in the 1780's, they established beyond a doubt that "commerce" meant the general field of economic activity, and was not limited simply to the movement of commodities or service across State lines.

Mr. MORSE. The Senator from Illinois is completely correct. Of course, what the Senator from Illinois has pointed out was stated in earlier decisions of the U.S. Supreme Court. John Marshall, as I have said, had this concept of commerce, and I would that southern Senators today were following in his footsteps. But they are not, as evidenced by the debate on the bill.

What I wish to point out is that this debate has been a historic contest once again on this historic floor over a dynamic interpretation of a section of the Constitution of the United States versus a static one. The arguments that were made in support of amendments which sought to restrict the Supreme Court in the application of the commerce clause were really an attempt to repudiate the great constitutional liberalism of Justices, such as Cardoza, Holmes, Brandeis, and the great Justices who sit on the Supreme Court today.

I have referred at some length in the course of the debate, and make only passing reference to the subject now, to the great decision of Chief Justice Earl Warren in the Fairlawn case. We are too close to that decision to appreciate fully its historic effects, but I prophesy tonight that if we could come back to this Chamber 25 years from tonight, and again there should be a debate on the meaning of the commerce clause of the Constitution, the language of Justice Warren, in the Fairlawn case would be quoted over and over again in that debate. I made these references to the bill tonight because I wished the RECORD to show at least the political, economic, social, and legal philosophy from which I argued throughout the course of the debate.

I make one more passing reference to what happened in the debate, because I know very well what sources of distortion in this country will attempt to do to any position that the Senator from Oregon takes. I wish to refer again to the speech I made this afternoon in opposition to the Monroney amendment.

I was so deeply concerned as a constitutional liberal and as one who has at least attempted to verse himself in constitutional law about the implications of the Monroney amendment, so far as its legal effects were concerned, that I had no hesitation to make the decision I made, and candidly announced that decision on the floor of the Senate during the course of my remarks. When I made that speech I was satisfied that the votes were present in the Senate to pass the Monroney amendment. I was also satisfied that many Senators had not considered the legal implications of the Monroney amendment. In my opinion the passage of the amendment would have been a tragic mistake from the standpoint of existing decisions in regard to the commerce clause.

The legislative process is a compromising process, and in this case I compromised time and time again, short of compromising what I considered to be a matter of principle. The compromise I entered into this afternoon was on the question whether or not we would have a coverage in round numbers of some 4 million people or a coverage of less than 3 million. The experts from the Department of Labor who had access to the floor by consent of the committee were here to give us current statistical effects of each and every amendment offered on the floor of the Senate, and the Department of Labor experts notified us that the Monroney amendment would take out of coverage some 1,200,000 workers in this country.

The Anderson-Smathers amendment, as submitted to us, and on the basis of which I made the statement I made during the course of my speech, would take out some 350,000.

I wanted those workers covered. I have said in committee and I have said in previous speeches on the floor of the Senate during this debate that I want all employees working in places of employment that are substantially in interstate commerce covered by a minimum wage bill. I offered in committee an amendment that would eliminate all exemptions to the minimum wage law.

As I said the other day, I hold to the point of view that we have reached that point of economic development in this country at which it can no longer be socially and economically justified that we deny minimum wage protection to any individuals working in an interstate commerce plant. We could not win on that endeavor in committee, and therefore in committee I had to go along with concession after concession in order to bring out the best bill that we could. As a result of concessions I made in committee, along with concessions made by others, we brought to the floor of the Senate a bill which the Labor Department tells us contains in new coverage about 5 million workers. So when it became perfectly obvious this afternoon as a result of conversations which we had with individual Senators that if we took the Anderson-Smathers amendment we would get additional votes to help defeat the Monroney amendment, I did not hesitate to announce publicly that I would vote for the Anderson-Smathers amendment.

I think the RECORD should show that the majority leader, the Senator from Texas [Mr. JOHNSON], the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. KENNEDY], and the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. ANDERSON] came to me and said that they hoped when I made my speech I would include in it a reference to the fact that if the Monroney amendment was defeated, the Smathers-Anderson amendment would be offered, and I did so. In doing so, I also said if it were offered I would vote for it on the basis of a compromise on the question of coverage, because I thought it was so important that we defeat the legal effects of the Monroney amendment in respect to the interstate commerce clause. I thought it was better to support an amendment that would result only in the loss, as we thought at that time, of some 350,000 workers rather than to have an amendment go through that would deny coverage to some 1,200,000 workers.

I think it is important, and I consider it desirable to have this record made at this point so that the public itself, if they read the RECORD, will have a little better understanding of the legislative process at work on the floor of the Senate.

In that compromise, I compromised no principle, but I fought to protect a principle that is embodied in a long line of decisions of the U.S. Supreme Court applying the interstate commerce clause. Those decisions would have been disrupted by the Monroney amendment.

When I announced I was going to support that compromise, it was my understanding that the Anderson-Smathers amendment in regard to the automobile industry was limited entirely to overtime, and that the only thing that was being taken out of the Fair Labor Standards Act was the overtime provisions as they affected the automobile industry. I know that that was the understanding of the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. ANDERSON], because in his conversation with us that was his explanation of the bill.

I know also that the Senator from New Mexico was a completely innocent victim as to what happened in respect to that amendment. The fact is that when the amendment went to the desk it was so worded that it covered not only overtime, but also minimum wages. However, a yea-and-nay vote had already been ordered, and under the rules of the Senate the amendment could not be perfected without unanimous consent of the Senate. The Senator from New Mexico, recognizing this error in the language of his amendment, and recognizing the difference between the amendment and the explanation that he had made to the Senator from Texas [Mr. JOHNSON], to the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. KENNEDY], and to the senior Senator from Oregon, sought to perfect his amendment. His attempt was objected to by the minority leader, the Senator from Illinois [Mr. DIRKSEN]. The explanation of the minority leader is already in the RECORD. I make no comment about it, other than to say that as the result of his objection, the Senator from New Mexico was denied the privilege of perfecting his amendment. That fact remains uncontested, no matter what the explanation or rationalization or motivation of the Senator from Illinois might have been.

The compromise I had referred to was not the compromise that reached the desk. I could have voted against it, because it was different from what I thought it was. I believed that to do so would be interpreted by many as a walking out on the commitment I had made on the floor of the Senate. Once I make a commitment, I stand by it. Furthermore, I felt I was somewhat implicated in the document that went to the desk by way of dereliction, in the sense that I never read the exact language of the amendment as it went to the desk. That was my mistake. I felt I should live by my mistake, although it was, as I have explained, a perfectly innocent mistake.

So I voted for the Anderson-Smathers amendment with the mistake in it, and kept my commitment, although no one could raise any question as to whether I would offer a compromise on the floor of the Senate and then not vote for the compromise. I did vote for it, and I would again under the same circumstances.

I have said these things because I think they should be made a part of the legislative history of the bill.

I close by saying that in my opinion it is a good bill under all the circumstances. It ends up with a few thousand over 4 million new workers brought under coverage.

The RECORD should show that I am not through in this fight. There will be other sessions of the Senate, and come the next session of the Senate the senior Senator from Oregon will offer further amendments to the Fair Labor Practice Act, seeking to bring under coverage people who are left out of coverage as the result of the bill we passed tonight.

In the conference I shall do my very best to seek to get a bill as close to the Senate bill as possible. If there is any reduction in the effects of that bill, I serve notice now that come the next session of Congress I shall fight for its enlargement. During the campaign ahead, I shall take this issue to platform after platform, because I am convinced, as was stated in the great speech of the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. HUMPHREY] tonight, once we get these facts to the American people, we do not have to be concerned about their final decision as to whether a full minimum wage should be paid in this country. The voters of the country recognize that the security of our free economy is more dependent upon a high purchasing power of the consumers of this country than on any other one economic fact.

When we fight as we have fought for fair minimum wages, we are fighting to strengthen the purchasing power of the consumers of this country, and we are fighting to strengthen the economic position of the businessmen of this country.

More and more businessmen are beginning to realize how sound the constitutional liberals have been in the past 20 years, as they have fought for such checks against inflation, such checks against depression, as the social security bill, the unemployment insurance bill, the fair labor standards bill, and the other great pieces of social welfare that provide economic reliefs which are necessary to protect the businessmen when the economic cycle starts to go down.

I close with this part of my speech by saying it has been a great honor for me to be associated with Senator KENNEDY and Senator JOHNSON and these other fine colleagues, as we have worked together shoulder to shoulder in seeking the passage of the best possible fair labor standards amendment bill we could.

Again I thank them for their cooperation.

At this point I wish to make brief reference to a portion of yesterday's debate on the pending measure.

Upon rereading a colloquy on pages 16626–16627 between the Senator from Colorado [Mr. CARROLL], the Senator from Ohio [Mr. LAUSCHE], and the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. FULBRIGHT] I feel it necessary to clarify my position slightly in order that the RECORD may be clear with regard to this important legislation.

The basic problem is whether or not S. 3758, incorporating amendments to the minimum wage bill, by its use of the words "affecting commerce" would cover every enterprise throughout the length and breadth of the country. Quite clearly, the Congress may not legislate constitutionally in areas not covered by the commerce clause of the Constitution. Thus a local barbershop would clearly not be covered. Nor would, in my estimation, a workshop which utilized local materials and sold all of its products at retail. Some examples of this kind of thing come to mind in those situations where local handicraft manufacturing takes place of such things as pottery making or basket weaving where all of the products are sold at the roadside to individual customers.

The difficulty with the case proposed by the Senator from Colorado, of a coal mine in Colorado selling coal at retail, is that such a mining operation would probably be required to purchase not only machinery but the many supplies and equipment which are necessary for the operation of a coal mine, and these supplies would necessarily come from out of the State. Such a mine, if it sold at retail, could theoretically be operated on such a small scale that it would not be covered by the commerce power or at least it would come within the recognized doctrine "de minimis." As a practical matter under the bill which we are considering, a retail establishment which sells less than $1 million would not be covered. A coal mine which sold more than $1 million at retail would more than likely be a heavy supplier of a manufacturing establishment or other operation which clearly is in the stream of commerce.

With respect to the intrastate business of raising and selling cattle, it is easier for me to imagine such an operation quite outside the grasp of Federal power. The occasional ax or knife required in such an operation would not, in my view, come within the cases decided by the Supreme Court which I cited in my remarks of August 17. I would, of course, assume that the butchered meat would not be sold wholesale to enterprises which are themselves clearly within the Federal power under the commerce clause.

In a circuit court decision decided in 1943—Polish National Alliance v. N.L.R.B. (136 F. 2d 175 at p. 180)—appears the following quote:

> Perhaps the cackle of the farmers' hen as she announces completion of her daily chore, or the squeal of the pig in its struggle to become a porker, are not beyond this boundary line, but in this we give no assurance.

Quite obviously, this humorous but too gloomy circuit court judge shares the concern of the Senator from Ohio that we are, in this bill, covering everything, including barbershops, bootblacks, and the cackle of the farmer's hen. I think we should assure the Senator from Ohio that it is not the intention of the sponsors of this legislation to invade those areas of economic activity which are beyond the commerce clause of the Constitution.

CONSERVATION OF SOIL AND WATER

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, each year I receive from soil conservation districts in my State a summary of the activities that have been carried on for the preservation of the precious natural resources of soil and water.

The work of these soil conservation districts illustrates a basic tenet of soil conservation in its devotion to the concept that the soil and water resources used by the present generation will be a trusteeship for the future.

The meaning of conservation is set forth in one such report that I received recently concerning the operations of the Sauvie Island Soil Conservation District. The statement of principles which may be found on page 3 of the publication succinctly sets forth the philosophy of soil conservation. I ask unanimous consent that it may be printed at this point in my remarks, together with the report of Mr. Elmer Peterson, secretary-treasurer of the Sauvie Island board, who is also the president of the Oregon Association of Soil Conservation Districts.

I commend Mr. Peterson, and, through him, all the men and women who are capably and with a sense of dedication, working to preserve our heritage of land and water.

There being no objection, the statement and report were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE MEANING OF CONSERVATION

To use our soils to produce to their fullest within their capabilities, to improve them, to maintain them, and in the end, to leave them better;

To harvest the products of the soil—the forests with their timber, the rangeland with its forage, and the crop plants with their food—so that the soil is unimpaired and the products are thriftily used;

To use the waters on and under the surface of the land from their sources to sea so as to have always present an abundant supply, clear and clean, with flow sufficiently controlled to prevent unnecessary damage;

To manage in such a way that we may enjoy the wildlife of forests, streams, range and farm land, for sport and for recreation, encouraging always its survival and, in balance with other resources;

To take from the earth its minerals, its coal, its petroleum, its other stored or nonrenewable resources, in such a way that the supply is not wasted, but is used with good sense, and made to last for time to come;

To manage all these resources, as they relate one to another in our watersheds and our communities;

And, as a sum of all these, to use efficiently, wisely, and without waste, the natural resources of the earth for the benefit of this and coming generations, and thus to insure continuing prosperity for the people of a free world.

DISTRICT HISTORY

(By Elmer Peterson)

Lieutenant Broughton and party were the first white men to land on Sauvie Island. This occurred in 1792, and from that date to the present many events and changes have taken place. These include visits from the Lewis and Clark Expedition, David Thompson and company and Nathaniel J. Wyeth.

In 1834 Wyeth established on the island a trading post called "Fort William." The remains of the fort are located on the Jim Lyons farm. In about 1885 Laurent Sauvie established and operated a dairy on the island which still bears his name. American pioneers began to settle donation land claims in 1840–1850, and from these beginnings the agriculture of the island has steadily changed and advanced.

Prior to 1921 all lands on the island, with the exception of a few hundred acres were subject to the annual spring overflow. In 1921 the Columbia Drainage District No. 1 was formed and 1,564 acres were protected by a levee. Twenty years later the Sauvie Island Drainage District was organized and an additional 12,013 acres were diked. The organization of the Sauvie Island Drainage District greatly accelerated the agricultural growth of the island by making possible a great variety of crops and livestock enterprises.

The next step forward was the formation of the Sauvie Island Soil Conservation District, the ninth such district to be formed in Oregon. This was completed February 15, 1944 and contained 13,636 acres. The first addition to this district occurred in 1946 when the petition of 20 property owners with 4,173 acres was approved and the area included in the district.

The second addition to the district came about in 1957, when the remaining area of the island, approximately 10,000 acres, was added to the Sauvie Island Soil Conservation District. This second addition consisted of lands owned almost entirely by the Oregon State Game Commission, a cooperator with the district. The area consists entirely of overflow lands and is used almost entirely as wildlife refuge, public shooting of migratory birds and as a general recreation area for the public. Boy Scouts and other youth groups make good use of the recreational facilities.

The levee construction and erection of a bridge to the mainland, formation of drainage districts and the organization of the soil conservation district, have made possible the present agricultural picture on the island. Agriculture today consists of fruit, nuts, berries, dairy, beef and sheep enterprises, a wide range and variety of truck produce, peppermint, grains and greenhouse crops. Considerable ash and cottonwood is also harvested. One of the largest growers of nursery stock on the Pacific coast is located on the island. The potential of upland game birds and waterfowl has been recognized by local landowners and several dog kennels for breeding, training and boarding have been established.

The agricultural picture has changed much since the establishment of the first dairy in about 1835, but in one respect no change has taken place. The area is still completely rural. No towns or manufacturing plants are on the island.

During the year 1959 and 1960 it has been my pleasure and honor to serve as the president of the Oregon Association of Soil Conservation Districts.

The State association consists of 57 districts. In the State 11,000 farmers and ranchers are cooperators with some 11 million acres in farm and ranch plans, so you can see soil conservation is big business. Our organization is the only farm structure that enjoys complete freedom from governmental controls.

We do not have any power to levy taxes but derive our income from our friendships with farmers and ranchers, equipment dealers, and other businessmen. However, our work in such jobs as land leveling, both open and tile drainage, range and pasture management, wind erosion, and other types of conservation practices would not be possible if it were not for the technical assistance we receive from our agencies such as the Soil Conservation Service, ASC, research labs, extension service and others. Our State association is making an all-out effort to assist the local districts with their problems in the field of research, legislation, education, publicity. We have committees set up which are working on the above problems.

During the year I have had the opportunity to visit districts and supervisors in just about every part of our State and in most cases we have made consistant progress with our work on individual farms and in watersheds. One has to travel to the remote sections of our State to see the overall part that soil conservation districts has played.

In my travels it has been my good fortune to attend the 1959 National Convention in Houston, Tex. and this year, 1960, to represent my State as councilman at the National Soil Conservation Convention in Louisville, Ky.

The other members of the State board and myself are looking forward to a busy and successful conservation year in 1960 in each district in Oregon.

THE JOB AHEAD IN 1960

Each year your supervisors and work unit develop an annual plan of operations. The work for the coming year, and means and ways of getting the job done, are outlined and used as a guide for the people responsible for results.

It is the intent of your board of supervisors to have all agricultural lands in the district covered by farm plans by the end of 1960. Farm plans are a guide to the best land use and are the basis for a successful district.

The construction of wildlife shooting ponds and areas will be speeded up due to the realization that wildlife is a distinct crop and must be planned and harvested as such.

More intensive drainage is needed on lakebed soils to allow earlier cultivation and longer growing seasons. Proper drainage leads to better use of fertilizers and irrigation water and allows the refinements that make up a well-balanced farm crop program.

Both drainage districts will carry on their necessary maintenance programs.

Several larger drainage jobs will be completed. The main ones are the completion of the new pump plant in Mud Lake and the relocation of the Reeder Road culvert. This latter job is a cooperative effort among the Multnomah County Road Department, the Sauvie Island Drainage District, and your soil conservation district.

If you are considering jobs involving engineering work your board urges you to apply for assistance as soon as possible.

Where to get assistance with soil and water problems:

Tom Davis, Soil Conservation Service, Route 1, Box 116–D, Portland, Oreg.

Multnomah County Extension Service, 611 East Powell, Gresham, Oreg.

Columbia County Extension Service, Court House, St. Helens, Oreg.

Multnomah County A.S.C. Committee, 611 East Powell, Gresham, Oreg.

Columbia County A.S.C. Committee, 20 Plaza Square, St. Helens, Oreg.

Your local soil conservation district supervisors.

THE LATE HUGH BENNETT, SOIL CONSERVATIONIST

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, during the recent adjournment of Congress, a sorrowful event of national significance occurred.

I refer to the passing of the grand old man of soil conservation, Hugh Bennett, who peacefully departed this life in his native State of North Carolina at the age of 79.

Hugh Bennett was a giant of his generation. He was dedicated to the ideal that the land from which our food and fiber come must be preserved as a trusteeship for the generations unborn.

As a young man on his father's plantation, he had observed the terrible ravages of soil erosion. As a dedicated civil servant, he translated the principle of the protection of the soil into the actuality embodied in the magnificent work each year being performed by the Soil Conservation Service of the Department of Agriculture.

Truly this agency is a living memorial to Hugh Bennett; for he fathered it, guided and developed it; and lived to see it grow into a permanent institution of lasting benefit to all of our citizens.

Perhaps one of the sayings of Hugh Bennett which is most characteristic of his idealism, which was always allied with practicality, is a statement he once made which I now quote:

We cannot dig deeper into the earth and find new productive soil. We cannot pump it from wells, plant it with seeds, or dig it from mines. We must keep what we have or do without.

Mr. President, Hugh Bennett was a great public servant who ranks in our national roster with the other heroes of national resource conservation and protection. He stands in the company of Gifford Pinchot and Theodore Roosevelt. And it is a measure of this stature of Hugh Bennett that he stands there in that glorious company as an equal.

OLD WEST LINGERS ON IN OREGON

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, the travel section of the Sunday, July 10, issue of the New York Times contained an article entitled "Old West Lingers On in Oregon's High Country."

The article was written by Ralph Friedman, of Portland, and describes a trip through Harney County in southeast Oregon, starting at Burns and making a 225-mile loop through Harney County.

Starting from Burns, the traveler is taken south through the cattle country described as "a vast area of sagebrush and scanty vegetation broken by mountain ranges, rimrock, juniper-covered tablelands and barren hills, where thousands of cattle graze and wild horses roam the more secluded vales and canyons." The trip described follows a route across the Narrows Bridge, where Malheur and Harney Lakes touch, and continues past Sod House and the Malheur National Wildlife Refuge down to Frenchglen.

It was near here that the legendary Pete Ranch established a 132,000-acre cattle ranch, only to lose his life to a homesteader.

Thereafter the route continues south past some of the famous ranches of the American West down to Fields and then northeast again through Follyfarm, Princeton, Crane, and back to Burns.

This picturesque trip takes the traveler through a large piece of the remaining pioneer rangeland of America and I am delighted to see this fine description of it in the New York Times.

I ask unanimous consent that the article be printed at this point in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the New York Times, July 10, 1960]

OLD WEST LINGERS ON IN OREGON'S HIGH COUNTRY

(By Ralph Friedman)

PORTLAND, OREG.—The Old West still lives in Oregon's Harney County, a great expanse of sage and rimrock far east of the green Cascades. Here, where two families make up a town, cattle grazes over hill and valley, honest-to-goodness cowpokes ride the range, and the pure sounds and sights of Nature's unblemished domain possess most of the region.

Burns, the seat of Harney County, is the gateway and terminal of a 225-mile loop trip extending through remote ranch country in which a telephone is a prized trophy and a television set is a mark of real distinction.

Harney is the most spacious of Oregon's 36 counties and has almost twice as many square miles as it has population. The county has only one movie house, in Burns; only two physicians, both in Burns; only two television sets outside of Burns, and one weekly newspaper, the Burns Times Herald.

There is no rail transportation and no buses leave U.S. 20, the arid highroad between Boise and Portland. If one does not have a car and wants to penetrate the back country, he either hitchhikes or rides with the rural mail carrier, who makes three trips a week when the road is passable.

Although Harney boasts the largest bird sanctuary in the Nation, it is essentially cattle country, both economically and as a way of life. Ranches are large—immense may be a better word—and a child who reaches the age of 4 without having learned to ride a horse is considered an oddity.

WILD HORSES ROAM

Much of the glamor of the Old West still lingers in this frontierlike territory. Over a vast area of sagebrush and scanty vegetation broken by mountain ranges, rimrock, juniper-covered tablelands and barren hills, thousands of cattle graze and wild horses roam the more secluded vales and canyons.

Burns, the beginning and end of the 225-mile back-country tour, contains within its limits a colorful Paiute village that is the largest independent Indian community, other than a reservation, in the United States.

The loop road starts as gravel, but it is dirt much of the way. Although all of the road is negotiable from May through September, it is not a speedway and should be treated with the consideration due a road that is more familiar with horses' hoofs than with the tires of passenger cars.

Twenty-eight miles from Burns, the road crosses the Narrows Bridge, where Malheur and Harney Lakes touch. Malheur, on the east, is fresh and sweet, being fed by running water from the Silvies and Blitzen Rivers, while Harney is distinctly alkaline, having no stream inlets. Apart from some rain, Harney receives its water from the Malheur overflow.

Seven miles below the Narrows Bridge stands Sod House, which was built in 1862 and is now the entrance to the 165,000-acre Malheur National Wildlife Refuge. Upward of 220 winged species have been observed here. In addition to the avian population, more than 50 species of mammals reside in this refuge.

A 100-foot observation tower affords an excellent view of the preserve, and dike roads slither to the heart of the breeding marshes. The refuge has no motels or campgrounds close by, but visitors are permitted to bed down in the recreation hall at the preserve's headquarters.

Below Sod House, the road turns to dirt and winds gingerly through the Blitzen Valley to Frenchglen, 65 miles south of Burns. Frenchglen has the only hotel between Burns and Winnemucca, Nev., a distance of about 215 miles.

A RANGE EMPIRE

The romance of the country's storied past is heaviest in Frenchglen. This is only a lariat throw from the P-Ranch, headquarters of the legendary Pete French. In the spring of 1872, French entered the valley, driving a herd of cattle from California. One look at the amazing expanse of wild meadows and he knew that he had found the site to establish the cattle domain of his dreams, a range empire similar to that of the Spanish grandees.

Through the iron-handed authority of his faithful vaqueros and the trickery of every method he could devise, French built the P-Ranch into a 132,000-acre spread. His running wars with the Indians and the homesteaders have given Oregon its richest rimrock lore. One rainy afternoon, French was shot from his horse by a "nester," and his cow kingdom crumpled almost overnight.

The fabulous white mansion that French built for his bride burned down long ago, but the cottonwood and poplar groves he planted for her, and his Spanish-style corrals and barns, remain as material links to the Pete French saga.

BACK-COUNTRY INN

Frenchglen's hotel, a hearty, informal, back-country inn, has eight sleeping rooms and a dining room. Meals are served family style on an oilcloth-covered table. Coffee is free any time of the day or night to anyone, guests or not.

The hotel lobby is the social center for all of the town's 21 inhabitants, as well as the 40 or 50 other folks who trek in from all parts of the valley for mail and supplies. Dances are held in the schoolhouse with a single fiddler supplying the music. The affairs are real hoedowns.

Almost any evening, the hotel lobby looks like the setting for a Western Canterbury tale. The fiddler, a cook at a ranch in the next valley, comes into town to practice before a live audience; bird watchers from Portland exchange talk with cowboys; a herd foreman, homeward bound from Burns, where he had gone on business, drops in to pass on the news he has learned there; an itinerant salesman tries to talk the innkeeper into purchasing a dozen more bedsheets; and the young schoolteacher, taking a breather from marking papers, earnestly discusses the attitudes of parents with the innkeeper's wife, once a teacher herself.

The loop tour can be made in 1 day, but it is a tiresome task. Most travelers find that a 2-day trip, with an overnight stop at Frenchglen, provides greater pleasure. From Frenchglen, a side road skirts the P-Ranch and ascends the Steens to 6,800-foot-high Fish Lake, one of Oregon's finest lakes for angling. Cabins and boats are available at the lake.

A dirt road climbs from Fish Lake to the top of the Steens, winding through meadowed valleys, where Basque-tended sheep graze. On a clear day, Nevada, Idaho, and Washington are visible from the mountain heights. So is Hart Mountain Antelope Refuge, reached from Frenchglen by a 100-mile sagebrush trail.

THE ONLY TELEPHONE

South of Frenchglen, beyond a low hill, lies Catlow Valley, occupied almost exclusively by stockmen. The first ranch, Roaring Spring, which has the only telephone in Catlow Valley, is a pioneer spread. When the cowpokes are not riding the range or socializing in the hotel lobby, they "hole up" in two-room cabins, where they spend the evenings sitting around pot-bellied iron stoves, reading Western paperbacks or adding more pinups to the cluttered walls.

Fields, 50 miles south of Frenchglen, contends that it is farther from a railroad than any settlement in the Nation, excluding Alaska and Hawaii. The distance given is 124 miles. Sometimes the entire hamlet of 11 persons assembles in Bill Finley's house to watch the only television set between Burns and Winnemucca.

Most ranchers and homesteaders in the silent valleys have their own generators; otherwise, they do without electricity. Some do not even own radios. But in this isolated immensity of desert, mountains and open sky, the rest of the world seems not too important.

At Fields, the loop road swings northeast and, after breezing through open antelope ranges and passing the picturesque Basque sheep station at Andrews, comes abreast of the 25,000-acre Alvord Ranch, one of the oldest and most interesting cattle spreads in the West.

Follyfarm, 60 miles above Fields, has one singular commendation: State Route 78, a paved highway, intersects the dirt road and heads for Burns. Between Follyfarm and Princeton, 30 miles to the north, a 3-mile-long paved side road links the highway with Malheur Cave, a half-mile lava tube with a quarter-mile underground lake at the far end. The walls of the 50-foot-wide tunnel are glazed and stained with bronze, gray, black, and red. Gasoline lanterns for cave visits may be borrowed from the Harney County Chamber of Commerce in Burns.

BOOTS AND HOMEWORK

Crane, 10 miles north of Princeton, is the site of Oregon's only boarding high school. Ranch and hamlet youngsters from as far as 100 miles away are enrolled. They wear Levi's and cowboy boots to class, sleep in dormitories, and work for their food and lodging. Probably no student body in the Nation can boast as many rodeo contestants, for everyone is an expert on a horse and rodeo competition takes the place of football.

Burns, 29 miles to the northwest, marks the end of the 255-mile loop tour, a journey backward through time into the days of the Old West. From Burns, U.S. 20 to the west is a red arrow shot through the desert. Piercing the sageland, it finds its target at Bend, 132 miles away. Bend, at the foot of the high Cascades, offers travelers the choice of five highways across the mountains to the Willamette Valley and Portland. And U.S. 97 to the south is the most direct route to California.

COST OF LIVING INCREASE IN FEDERAL CONTRIBUTION TO SOCIAL SECURITY AND PENSION PAYMENTS IN LOWER INCOME BRACKETS

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed at this point in the RECORD a resolution approved by the Lincoln Pomona Grange, of Oregon, relating to a 50-percent cost of increase in the Federal contribution to social security and pension payments in the lower income brackets.

There being no objection, the resolution was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

"Whereas official statistics indicate that the cost of living is continually increasing; and

"Whereas because of continuous increase many people on social security, or pensions, find it increasingly difficult to maintain a desirable standard of living, since the purchasing power of their social security, or pensions is greatly reduced: Now, therefore, be it

"Resolved by Lincoln Pomona Grange in regular session assembled this 11th day of June 1960, That we favor a 50-percent cost-of-living increase in the Federal contribution to social security and pension payments in the lower income brackets, as for example less than $100 per month; and be it further

"Resolved, That a copy of these resolutions be sent to the Oregon State Grange convention for approval there; to U.S. Senators WAYNE L. MORSE and HALL LUSK and to the Honorable WALTER NORBLAD, Congressman from this district, asking them to support national legislation before Congress adjourns, to provide for this cost-of-living increase in the Federal pension and social security payments as designated herewith."

Approved by Lincoln Pomona Grange this 11th day of June 1960.

RULE OF LAW IN WORLD AFFAIRS

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, Mr. Charles S. Rhyne, past president of the American Bar Association, spoke recently at the Dickinson School of Law graduation exercises on the subject of the rule of law in world affairs. The title of his speech was "U–2 and Summit Failure as an Impetus to International Law."

I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD excerpts from Mr. Rhyne's speech.

There being no objection, the excerpts were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

EXCERPTS FROM SPEECH BY CHARLES S. RHYNE, PAST PRESIDENT, AMERICAN BAR ASSOCIATION, AT THE DICKINSON SCHOOL OF LAW GRADUATION EXERCISES

First of all let's look at present rules of law which are universally accepted by the world community, including Russia. The list is not long:

1. The law of diplomatic immunity.
2. The law of the sea.
3. The law of the air.
4. The International Postal Convention.
5. The Radio and Telecommunications Conventions.
6. The Antarctica Convention.

The new conventions on the law of the sea demonstrate that it is possible by new law to modernize in part age-old rules in that field. The Antarctica Convention while of limited interest is recent proof that it is possible to draft law rules covering fields not previously governed by law. In every field where we have law rules the ever accelerating contacts between nations operate smoothly and without friction. The very existence of the rules brings this about. Sure there are law rule breakers internationally just as there are within nations. And beyond question the existing need is both for more and better law rules as well as more and better ways of handling violators. The development of both are parts of our program.

Let's look at the potential subject matter for new law in the world community. Fields where if we had law rules the chances of friction and disputes leading to war would be lessened. These include:

1. A disarmament convention.
2. A convention on the use of outer space.
3. A nuclear tests convention.
4. An "open skies" convention.
5. Conventions facilitating international business in literally hundreds of areas and on many subjects.
6. A convention guaranteeing the safety of foreign investment to facilitate the flow of private funds into underdeveloped nations.

The area unfilled by law internationally is almost unlimited. We have thousands of law rules within nations but so very few internationally. And the ever multiplying contacts in our shrunken world make progress here vital to all mankind. Science has outraced law and law must catch up. As in the case of existing universally adhered to international law, the problem of how to cope with international lawbreakers is important and difficult. The Kellogg-Briand Convention of 1928 renouncing war proved to be only a worthless pious expression of hope because it set up no machinery to deal with violators.

I deliberately mentioned an "open skies" convention to focus your attention upon some of the legal problems inherent in the U–2 flight and those raised for mankind by the creation and maintenance of closed societies.

The alleged violation of international law by flying over Russia at a high altitude is interesting as proof that even Khrushchev relies upon law when it serves his purposes. I could not help but think that on his record of respect for law Khrushchev in this instance stands about in the position of a Dillinger offering proof that J. Edgar Hoover was speeding 26 miles an hour in a 25-mile zone.

There is no question but that if you or I as lawyers were defending the United States in a lawsuit based on the U–2 flight over Russia we could raise many new and novel legal questions. Three examples are: (1) How far up is a nation sovereign over airspace? (2) Was not U–2 justified as an act of self-defense, a right conferred upon nations by section 51 of the United Nations Charter? (3) Can overflight by an unarmed plane constitute an act of aggression? And we would undoubtedly rely upon Russia's failure to protest these flights while knowing—according to Khrushchev—that they have been taking place for the past 4 years as a waiver of any claim of sovereignty violation. Further, Russia herself launched the first satellites and has sent others over the United States constantly—as has the United States over Russia—every few minutes for the past 2 years with no one protesting that these constitute sovereignty violations even when they admittedly transmit photographs to their launchers.

I believe that an impartial court would hold that Russia's secret, closed society coupled with her threats based upon her atomic, satellite, and ICBM developments, and her announced plans for world domination justifies a defensive measure like U–2 and further that the overflight of an unarmed plane is not an aggressive act within the meaning of the United Nations Charter. The U.N. Security Council certainly so voted.

The whole problem of the legality in today's world of the Iron Curtain itself could be raised in any such lawsuit. I believe that the creation and maintenance of the Iron Curtain is itself a crime against humanity—a violation of the U.N. Charter as a threat to world peace. Suppose the United States were to announce tomorrow that henceforth we intend to close ourselves off from the rest of the world. The worldwide shock of such an announcement would be tremendous. And worldwide condemnation would be both immediate, overwhelming, and deserved. Who can doubt that Russia itself would lead a chorus of finger pointers questioning whether or not we were invoking secrecy to plot aggression?

Every journey begins with the first step and if U–2 triggers steps toward the formulation of new law rules for overflights of unarmed aircraft and new rules for the operation of satellites over other nations, before great war-exploding incidents occur, mankind will have profited greatly by that ill-fated flight.

Also, if the jarring U–2 episode helps in getting rid of secret closed societies—just by its world spotlight upon their existence and evils—it obviously will have furthered peace in the world. Vice President NIXON last April in discussing the summit's possibilities put it well when he said:

"We must make evident to the entire world that if the Soviets are willing to consider some progress toward the kind of open society which we in the West maintain, both disarmament and peace itself can become realizable objectives rather than hopeless dreams. The closed society of the Soviet Union is in fact, the major barrier to the disarmament which the great majority of the people in all nations want."

Open skies like open seas would serve all mankind. Grotius postulated the open seas doctrine in 1605 and it took over 200 years before it was fully accepted as universal law. Let us hope the "open skies" doctrine receives a more speedy acceptance as universal law.

I shall not go further with things U–2 or the Paris summit collapse should stimulate in the field of law growth. Suffice it to say I have only scratched the surface.

Law enforcement internationally and law growth internationally are both hampered by lack of adequate dispute settlement machinery. Disputes are inherent in the nature of man and nations but since the beginning of time man has created only three methods for resolving such conflicts:

1. Brute force by fists or weapons.
2. Voluntary agreement by discussion and negotiation between the parties.
3. Third party decision in an impartial tribunal.

Use of presently available weapons force between nations is too horrible to envision as a method of deciding disputes. This merely underscores the fact that new methods of warmaking must be combated by new methods of peacemaking.

Settlement of disputes by voluntary agreement has sometimes proved to be impossible in the past with the result that wars have occurred down through the ages. Nothing in the record of this method proves its ingredients can prevent wars in the future any more than they have in the past.

The one permanent institution we have for impartial third party decision of disputes internationally is impotent and therefore unused. It is the World Court created to substitute justice of the courtroom for slaughter of the battlefield. This Court is impotent and unused because the U.S. Senate insists upon its so-called Connally amendment—attached by Senator Connally in 1946 to our acceptance of the Court's jurisdiction—long before Russia's acquisition of the A-bomb, satellites and ICBM's so radically altered the international picture as to enhance immeasurably the attractiveness of decision by court instead of by battle. The Connally amendment bases World Court jurisdiction on our case by case consent, and under the doctrine of international reciprocity this confers the same right upon all adversaries we bring to that Court. Disarmament, nuclear test ban and other violators will never voluntarily consent to be tried for their violations. This 1946 roadblock to the door of the World Court is thus obviously out of date in 1960 and should be speedily repealed. Recent Senate committee action delaying a vote on Connally elimination is a serious evasion of major responsibility in advancing world peace. International law will never achieve and maintain peace without a real court. That we should be the Nation to still insist on trial by battle rather than trial by court is shocking to say the least. Few concrete steps would do more to refurbish our prestige and moral leadership toward world peace than the elimination of Connally. Such a meaningful step would demonstrate to a watching world our belief in and adherence to law rather than to force at this crucial juncture, and we would help silence Khrushchev if we challenged him to do likewise. We need to get off the defensive and onto the offensive on the issue of peace. Ending Connally is an offensive step the peoples of the world would comprehend and applaud.

So here too there is a tremendous amount of work for lawyers with many among our own profession leading the battle to keep the World Court impotent as an instrument for world peace. Connally has clouded and impaired our moral leadership of the free world by providing concrete evidence that we distrust the rule of law internationally. Let us remind those who argue that the Court might possibly hand down an erroneous decision that a decision contrary to law or fact can always be changed whereas millions of gravestones the world over are rather mute testimony to the unchangeability of the results of war.

Regional institutions such as the Supreme Court of Europe which decides legal disputes arising out of the European Economic Community should be created all over the world. That Court's successful acceptance and extensive use in resolving present disputes between nations who previously for centuries engaged in bloody wars to settle their disputes is strong evidence that the World Court will work if but used. And the European Court's success is evidence also that a whole system of regional international courts are needed to decide small international legal disputes before they fester and grow into great inflammatory and almost insoluble political disputes involving a nation's pride and vital interests on which she cannot then back down.

Secretary Herter concluded his statement to the Senate Foreign Relations Committee on U–2, the summit failure and hopes for a peaceful future as follows:

"We have our own programs for helping to bring that future about—for holding high the light of freedom, for sharing its message and rewards with emerging nations, for trying to create an international community in which the rule of law will replace the rule of force. It is to these programs that our talents and energies should be rededicated in the uncertain times that lie ahead."

I hope this means that in addition to the private effort of lawyers herein described the Federal Government is now prepared to launch an all-out effort in the legal field to improve and expand law internationally. So far the Government has spent billions on science and the military to keep the peace. Few expenditures would yield more for the good of Americans and all mankind than Government financed research teams of legal experts working in universities and elsewhere on ways and means of improvement and expansion of the rule of law in the world community. The President has a special scientific adviser to energize our effort in science but no one in the Federal Government has the specific full-time assignment of energizing an all-out effort to bring international law and institutions up to date.

This has been a brief outline of some of the highlights of the lawyers' program to achieve world peace through the processes, principles, procedures and institutions of the rule of law. From what I have said you can envision our objectives and the path we expect to follow. In end result our effort should aid in creating a universal "law of nations" giving legal form and expression to the great moral principles embodied in the rule of law concept.

I cannot emphasize too strongly that in seeking a world rule of law ours is the strategy of gradualism. We do not expect to create a "law-ful" world full-blown, at one stroke, overnight, or in a year, or in several years. It will take years and perhaps decades of great effort.

We are not going to make the mistake of attempting more than we can really accomplish. Nor do we propose to flounder on the peril of perfectionism. After thousands of years we are still improving local law, State laws, national laws, local courts, State courts and national courts. If we waited until our traffic laws and courts were perfect, for instance, before we allowed traffic to move, our streets would be empty of cars. We will make a start on the problems and needs that exist in the international law field and work then for refinements and strengthening of our first efforts.

The greatest need of our day is for leadership on the issue of world peace. Leaders who can visualize and utilize the dramatic scientific advances of our day for man's benefit rather than his death. Leaders who realize that the rule of law offers the most universally acceptable and usable concept to achieve mankind's greatest need and desire—a peaceful world community.

No effort is too great, and no effort is wasted, which seeks to strengthen and develop forces by which the people of the world will move toward better mutual understanding, trust, and good will; for these alone are the basis upon which can be built a worldwide rule of law to bring peace to all mankind.

WATER POLLUTION—A NATIONAL DISGRACE

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, the current issue of the Progressive, dated August 1960, contains an article entitled "Water Pollution: A National Disgrace," written by Sherwood D. Ross.

Mr. Ross is described as a Chicago publicist whose association with municipal affairs has led him to make a comprehensive study of the water pollution problem in the United States. I think he does a fine job of summarizing the rising crisis our Nation is facing in its water supply and I ask consent to have his article appear at this point in my remarks so that it may be read by all Members of Congress.

I am thankful that at last there is beginning to be recognition of the fact that as in the case of timber, what was once considered as an inexhaustible supply of water is now being recognized as a diminishing resource. I point out, too, that it is diminishing only because we are not taking the pains to conserve and preserve it.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Progressive, August 1960]

WATER POLLUTION: A NATIONAL DISGRACE

(By Sherwood D. Ross)

American visitors to Mount Vernon are not ordinarily shocked by a sign that greets them as they enter these hallowed grounds. The sign is a warning, advising them not to come in contact with the water if they value their health. Such signs have become commonplace throughout the land; that one should rise at the dock on the Potomac River near the home of our first President is merely symbolic. In its way, it has a strangely reassuring effect: it reminds many Americans of home. So does the odor. They could be standing on the banks of such rivers as the Hudson, the Mississippi, the Columbia, the Wabash, the Illinois, the Colorado, the Tennessee, the Red, the Missouri, or the Ohio. The sign at the estate of George Washington is not a particularly good advertisement for the American way of life, but it has—in an age of Madison Avenue mendacity—the virtue of being honest. It tells the truth about a national disgrace.

The significance of the sign does not lie alone in the fact that, according to U.S. Public Health Service estimates, we are spending a billion dollars annually on a bad advertisement—polluted waters. Nor is it significant that the Potomac is an unabashedly dirty river, too dirty to swim or fish in—and, ironically, very nearly too dirty to drink. The sign on the Potomac stands for the fact that a growing crisis exists in the disposal of our sanitary wastes and in the preservation and purification of our water resources. It signifies that, unless immediate and far-reaching steps are taken to clean up the Nation's rivers and watercourses—our lakes, bays, and streams—the country will be in serious trouble.

This will not be mere dollars-and-cents trouble. There are more serious ills than those currently publicized by the Republican National Committee and the Bureau of the Budget. The startling truth is that the hour is rapidly approaching when the Nation's water utilities may be unable to supply enough pure water for our expanding population; when industrial progress and economic growth may be seriously slowed by water shortages; when much of our wilderness may be ruined for recreation; and when the sight of dark, odoriferous rivers winding through densely populated metropolitan areas may become the absurd hallmark of what future historians might, not so humorously, label "the Effluent Society."

Actually, the Effluent Society is already upon us. The U.S. Public Health Service states, "Pollution of our streams is occurring at a faster rate than treatment of waters for reuse. Growing amounts of untreated * * * sewage * * * are creating pollution problems which endanger the Nation's health and welfare." This view was underscored recently by the exhaustive and authoritative report of the Senate Select Committee on Natural Water Resources, better known as the Kerr committee, after its chairman, Senator ROBERT S. KERR, of Oklahoma. This study concludes, "Our waters are now receiving approximately twice as much pollution from municipal systems alone as was considered allowable in 1955." And it predicts that U.S. rivers, 20 years hence, will be carrying "nearly three times the allowable pollution."

The two principal sources of this burgeoning effluvium are rapidly growing industries and mushrooming cities. Effluent from some 10,000 factories and mines—which includes such toxic stuff as sulfuric acid, alkalines, petrochemicals, slaughterhouse, and atomic wastes—and from 11,000 municipal sewer outfalls is being poured pellmell into our water courses at record rates. The daily total of such liquid offal has increased from a population equivalent of 97 million persons in 1920 to 175 million today, and it is growing steadily.

Watersheds, by contrast, do not grow. The same amount of water which fell across the Nation in 1920—about 30 inches—will fall during 1960, and nearly three-fourths of this precipitation will be returned each day to the sky by evaporation. What is available for use is about 600 billion gallons per day, and nature has not provided for its equitable geographic distribution, as residents of the Southwestern States will attest. Today, the Nation uses 270 billion gallons of this total each day. By 1980, only two decades in the future, Americans will require 600 billion gallons of water each day, the total amount of water hydrologists estimate can be made economically available. In that year, according to Interior Secretary Fred I. Seaton, "Our water requirements will have burst through the ceiling." By that time, perhaps the Federal Government's snail's pace desalinization program will have succeeded in producing cheap potable water from the sea, but this will still need to be piped hundreds of miles inland, at great expense.

Meanwhile, pollution is cutting into our available supply. Many U.S. cities have already begun to feel the pinch. Chicago, which rises on the shore of the world's largest fresh watershed, is being opposed by six Great Lakes States in its efforts to divert more water from Lake Michigan to purify its sewage, which it afterwards flushes down the Illinois River. And New York City may rise on the Hudson, but its 8 million citizens must have their water piped in hundreds of miles from upstate watersheds. The Hudson is dark and dead. Moreover, if the city fathers entertained any extreme notions about cleaning it up above the salt water line to augment their supply, they must now reckon with the Atomic Energy Commission, which intends to use the Hudson in much the same fashion as it does the Columbia and the Mohawk—for the disposal of "low-level" atomic wastes.

Other cities, lacking New York's ability to finance hundred-mile-long aqueducts, must make do with watersheds of questionable quality. Of these cities—and there are hundreds—Washington is typical. In the time of James Monroe, S. L. Knapp, in his Lectures on American Literature, published in 1829, referred to the Potomac as "pure and sweet [and] * * * poetical." But in the era of Senator WAYNE MORSE, who has waged an unsuccessful campaign to clean it up, it is—in his words—"the filthiest river, for its size, in the whole world." Last year, the Potomac nearly failed to measure up to Public Health Service quality requirements. Water having a bacterial count of 5,000 or more coliform organisms per 100 milliliters is classified as an unfit supply for drinking without extra purification. The coliform count in George Washington's river averaged 4,862, a disquieting fact which moved a reporter for the Washington Post to comment, "The Potomac was OK by 138 bugs." Compared to many cities. residents of Washington are fortunate. The phrases of the Kerr Report are judicious and restrained, but their meaning comes through clearly: "The Connecticut River, in the present stage of planning, is not considered a source for public water supplies." Again: "Below Philadelphia pollution has made the Delaware River impractical as a source of water supply."

This helps explain why all but three States—Idaho, Rhode Island, and Mississippi—reported water shortages and 24 million Americans had their water rationed in 1953 a typical year. It sheds light on the widespread water rationing of 1957, when more than a thousand water companies had to curtail private use of water because the supply and pressure for firefighting and other public needs sank so hazardously low.

Pollution is, potentially, an even greater menace to public health than it is to public safety. Its ill effects were spelled out 3 years ago when cases of infectious hepatitis, a waterborne disease, broke out in those Missouri River cities which piped their water from "Big Muddy"—an apt designation for what is hardly more than an open-air sewer choked with packing house wastes, sludge, garbage, and gas. Worse, such outbreaks are not expected to diminish. In an address last year before the Federation of Sewage and Industrial Wastes Associations, Assistant Surgeon General Mark Hollis charged that "there has been no progress on pollution abatement" and pointed out that:

Urban growth, which tends to concentrate along the highways and waterways, is reducing the distance between one city's sewage outfall and the next city's water intake.

It will not be uncommon for water in one river to be reused five or six times.

Technological advances, particularly in the petrochemical industry, have created hundreds of new pollutants whose effects on human beings have not been evaluated.

Conventional waste-treatment technology (much less that required to combat the new chemical pollutants) lags behind the times; only a paltry $5 million is spent annually on waste-treatment research.

The union of known pollutants and exotic chemical contaminants will likely produce a chronic health hazard.

When one considers that industry today is the chief source of pollution, it is ironic that, by its own neglect, it plays havoc with its economic future—and that of the Nation. In the Northwest, for example, pollution threatens the salmon and tourist industries. Along the east coast and the Gulf of Mexico, it has already hurt the multimillion dollar shell-fish industry. In the Midwest, it has adversely affected the glass industry, among others, and in the Southwest, industrial developers cannot take advantage of geography to locate in population centers victimized by second-class water supplies. As the Wall Street Journal of April 4, 1957, observed: "Water supply now ranks with labor and transportation as a key factor in determining plant location. Some areas are being bypassed by industry because of water shortages, while water may play a big part in slowing the mushrooming growth of the Southwest."

What will happen in 1980, when water requirements "burst through the ceiling"? The Nation has only begun to find an answer.

After 40 years of neglect, permitting the transformation of our streams into sewers, Congress in 1956 passed the Water Pollution Control Act. This authorized Federal grants up to $50 million annually over a 10-year period for building sewage disposal plants and, in the 4 years since its passage, it has nearly doubled the rate of treatment plant construction, to almost $400 million annually. Praised editorially in Public Works magazine for stimulating "the gratifying growth of sewage treatment for small communities," the act has produced the highest local-to-Federal ratio of any national aid program, one in which municipalities have put up $4.70 for every dollar of Federal help. In this period, more than 1,300 projects have been started or placed on the drawing boards—projects whose ultimate effect will be to clean up 14,000 miles of rivers.

One vital feature of the act has been to empower the Secretary of Health, Education, and Welfare to issue cease and desist orders to plants and cities guilty of polluting a watershed. This provision has been invoked but once, when, in a history-making ukase last year, Secretary Arthur S. Flemming ordered Sioux City, Iowa, and five meatpackers located there to stop discharging raw sewage into the Missouri. Unfortunately, the Public Health Service must depend on the States to petition for relief. At present, it is powerless to initiate a forceful campaign to clean up interstate rivers and lakes. Where the Public Health Service has not had its hands tied—as in the administration of the construction grant program—it has zealously administered the law.

Despite the new sewage plants going up, the rate of construction remains, in the words of former U.S. Conference of Mayors President Richard J. Daley of Chicago, "pitifully inadequate"—a view shared by virtually every organization of conservation, health, State, and municipal officials in the Nation, as well as the President's own Water Pollution Advisory Board. Ignoring the advice of these expert groups—whose members are aware of an urgent need for 8,000 municipal sewage plants—the President last February vetoed the Democratic-sponsored Blatnik-Humphrey bill, aimed at raising the Federal help ceiling from $50 million to $90 million annually. In a display of mystifying logic, the President said he acted on the grounds that water pollution is a "uniquely local blight," overlooking a fact known to most fifth grade geography students—that about 2,000 rivers are interstate in character.

The cities are desperately in need of funds, and most rural-dominated State assemblies are indifferent to the needs of the urban clusters. For such obvious sidestepping, the President was subjected to a merciless attack in Congress even though the House failed by 21 votes to override his veto. A "shocked" Senator ERNEST GRUENING, Alaska Democrat, filled more than a page of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD with figures listing expenditures of $55 million funneled abroad recently by the International Cooperation Administration for precisely the type of waterworks and sewerage projects the President banned here as "uniquely local."

Urgently needed is a bold new national water program coordinating the efforts of some 25 Federal agencies now ineffectively engaged in haphazard and part-time water resources programing. A National Water Resources Council with a director of Cabinet rank could help blueprint local, State, metropolitan, and regional waterworks and sewage treatment utility programs and administer an improved sewage-abatement law. Such legislation, by spurring industrial growth, will repay the public many times over. Surely a nation which can afford $9 billion each year for alcoholic beverages can afford one-tenth that sum over 10 years to purify its water.

Meanwhile, the pollution signs continue to go up, along the Potomac and virtually every other major watercourse in the land. Unfortunately, the pollution menace will not abate until Congress enables the cities of America to purify their effluvium, and the last recalcitrant manufacturers are made to clean up their effluent before they take their profit. Just as we would not give away our forests and fields to privateers for personal gain, and as we have passed laws to stop the pollution of the air we breathe, so we should no longer tolerate the abuse of the Nation's most precious natural resource—our rivers and streams. On them depend the health, safety, and nourishment of our cities, industries, and people.

ADJOURNMENT TO 10:30 A.M. TOMORROW

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, unless another Senator wishes to address the Senate, I now move, as previously ordered, that the Senate stand in adjournment until 10:30 o'clock tomorrow morning.

May our Speaker and the Members of this legislative body, during the anguish of these present times, be richly blessed with good hope.

Give them a clear vision of that better day when nations shall no longer vie with one another for possessions and power, but for the ennobling of all life according to the pattern and principles of the Man of Galilee.

Hear us in His name and in His spirit. Amen.

EXTENSIONS OF REMARKS

We Must Climb to the Hilltop

OF

HON. HUBERT H. HUMPHREY

OF MINNESOTA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Thursday, August 18, 1960

Mr. HUMPHREY. Mr. President, the distinguished junior Senator from Massachusetts has written an article on the national purpose for the August 22 edition of Life magazine which I commend to the attention of my colleagues. It is an article of nourishing wisdom.

There is one passage that I should particularly like to quote:

If we are to recharge our sense of national purpose, we should accept no invitations to relax on a patent mattress stuffed with woolly illusions labeled peace, prosperity, and normalcy. We should congratulate ourselves not for our country's past glories and present accumulations but for our opportunities for further toil and risk. Rather than take satisfaction in goals already reached, we should be contrite about the goals unreached. We ought not to look for excuses in the budget, but for justification in the dizzying rush of events and in the harsh realities of our time.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that this splendid article be printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE NATIONAL PURPOSE DISCUSSION IS RESUMED—WE MUST CLIMB TO THE HILLTOP

(By Senator JOHN F. KENNEDY)

In all recorded history, probably the sagest bit of advice ever offered man was the ancient admonition to "know thyself." As with individuals, so with nations. Just as a man who realizes that his life has gone off course can regain his bearings only through the strictest self-scrutiny, so a whole people become aware that things have somehow gone wrong, can right matters only by a rigidly honest look at its core of collective being, its national purpose.

Thus, while on the one hand the fact that we have felt the urge to debate our national purpose signalizes our arrival at a potential crisis point, on the other hand the fact that we have entered into the debate willingly, indeed with gusto, bodes well for the eventual outcome.

Among our overindulgences of the past decade has been the lavish use of a kind of cloudy rhetoric that only befogs the truth. Yet basically we Americans prefer plain talk and common sense. It is these we must apply if we are to know ourselves again.

The facets of this debate on national purpose are many. Other than to agree that the whole subject vitally needs airing, the debaters are split a dozen ways as to which aspect of it demands greatest emphasis. Some prefer to dwell on what has happened to our national purpose—whether irrevocably lost, permanently strayed or temporarily sidetracked; others on why what has happened has happened; others on what can be done by way of remedy or retrieve. Above all, the debate turns on precisely what this "purpose" is that, momentarily or forever, has gone from our midst.

The distinguished contributors to previous installments of this Life series have offered a variety of definitions of our national purpose, all of them valid. From this it can be seen that no one word or catch phrase will suffice to pinpoint it. Our national purpose is resident, obviously, in the magnificent principles of the Declaration of Independence and of the Constitution and Bill of Rights. It also plainly appears in the writings of Jefferson, Madison, and Hamilton, in the words of Jackson and Lincoln, in the works of Emerson and Whitman, in the opinions of Marshall and Holmes, in Wilson's "new freedom" and Franklin D. Roosevelt's "four freedoms." In common, all of these pulse with a sense of idealistic aspiration, of the struggle for a more perfect Union, of the effort to build the good society as well as the good life here and in the rest of the world.

There is, I think, still another way to describe our national purpose. This definition, while almost a literal one, is nevertheless not a narrow one. It is that our national purpose consists of the combined purposefulness of each of us when we are at our normal best: striving, risking, choosing, making decisions, engaging in a pursuit of happiness that is strenuous, heroic, exciting and exalted. When we do so as individuals, we make a nation that, in Jefferson's words, will always be "in the full tide of successful experiment."

Such a definition, because it implies a constant, restless, confident questing, neither precludes nor outmodes, but rather complements, the expression of national purpose set forth in our declaration, our Constitution, and in the words of our great Presidents, jurists and writers. The purpose they envisioned can, indeed, never be outmoded, because it has never been and can never be fully achieved. It will always be somewhere just out of reach, a challenge to further aspiring, struggling, striving and searching. Quest has always been the dominant note of our history, whether a quest for national independence; a quest for personal liberty and economic opportunity on a new continent from which the rest of mankind could take heart and hope; a quest for more land, more knowledge, more dignity; a quest for more effective democracy; a quest for a world of free and pacific nations.

It should be said at once that no nation has a corner on striving and aspiring any more than on virtue and compassion. Thus our national purpose finds echo in the minds of men of good intent everywhere. But our purpose may differ from others in the particular background against which it evolved and by three fundamental facts about us:

First, Americans, more than other peoples, have since independence cherished a strong sense of destiny.

Second, we have always been optimists about our national future. Down through the decades we have had our indentured servants, our slaves and Simon Legrees, our sweated immigrants, our Okies, our depressed and discouraged folk of many stripes. But we have been unfailingly confident of winning through all obstacles to realize our dream.

Third, Americans have always been willing to experiment. With no feudal inheritance, with little dead weight of caste or tradition, we have ever been in the mood for bold adventure. Our forefathers would not have tossed aside old associations and crossed the seas without it. New frontiers have always seemed unfolding on our horizon.

With these basic considerations, and because of them, the pace of change in this land has been faster than anywhere else on the globe. The change has been less noisy and melodramatic than in Russia or China, among others, for since 1865 it has lacked any real elements of violence. We believe in progress by evolution, not revolution. But for precisely this reason the progress has been deeper, saner and more continuously rapid. In our energy, our resourcefulness and our powers of organization, we can assert that the United States has been and is the most dynamic nation in history.

Since this is so, why then our current widespread sense of staleness, of frustration; why the gnawing feeling that we may have lost our way? In my mind there are two broad answers.

One is that the very abundance which our dynamism has created has weaned and wooed us from the tough condition in which, heretofore, we have approached whatever it is we have had to do. A man with extra fat will look doubtfully on attempting the 4-minute mile; a nation replete with goods and services, confident that "there's more where that came from," may feel less ardor for questing.

The second answer is that we have, of late, lacked the leadership we require—human frailty being what it is—to remind us of our national purpose, to direct its shaping for current ends, to spur us to new efforts, to encourage and, if need be, to exhort.

In his stirring speech at Queen's Hall in London seeking World War I volunteers, David Lloyd George, soon to be Britain's Prime Minister, described a snug valley in his native Wales. Nestled between the mountains and the sea, shielded from the storms and stresses of the outside world, that little valley offered its inhabitants a placid and sheltered life. But on occasion, Lloyd George recalled, the young men of the valley would refuse to stay put. They would climb its highest hill to be inspired by the majestic peaks in the distance, to have their energies sharpened by the mountain breezes.

Too many Americans in the 1950's I believe, have been living too much of the time in such a valley. We have felt contented and complacent and comfortable. Now it is time once again to climb to the hilltop, to be reinvigorated and reinspired by those faraway peaks, the principles that are vital to our national greatness, that underlie our national purpose, that foster our "American dream."

Whether we see them or not, those peaks never change. Whether we remember it or not, their meaning never diminishes.

Thus the task that lies ahead is not to create a new national purpose, but to try to recapture the old one. This is no call to retrogression, for this purpose, born 184 years ago, will be as noble and as fresh 184 years hence—and beyond.

It is those same old slogans and same old solutions, surrounding the national purpose, that we must guard against. The old ways will not do. They cannot do. The Census Bureau predicts that, if the present curve of growth continues, our population will reach 260 million in only 20 years. When we think of how this increase alone will clothe all our problems in growing urgency, we know that when we once again seize hold of our purpose, we will have to do so with new ideas and new vigor.

Where and how do we apply our national purpose to the challenges of 1960?

Survival is often listed as the major challenge today, and certainly other issues are overshadowed by the one issue that could render the rest moot. But although our physical safety as a nation is more imperiled than ever before in our history, survival alone is insufficient as an expression of national purpose. Mere physical survival, at the cost of our way of life, would be worth little; more importantly, survival alone is hardly an aspiration worthy of a great nation. The nobleman who, when asked what he did in the Rench Revolution, replied, "I survived," may have been hailed for his wit but for little else.

We remember too seldom that survival is threatened not only by ever more awesome weapons of death and destruction but also by a lack of aim and aspiration. Outside the walls of every nation that has grown fat and overly fond of itself has always lurked a lean and hungry enemy.

Competition with that enemy is today deemed by some to be our major challenge; but it, too, reflects our national purpose inadequately. We are, indeed, in competition with the Soviets, and to a large extent our hopes for the future rest on our comparative efforts in economic growth, in the arms race, in scientific achievement, in aid to other nations, in propaganda, in prestige, and in a host of other fields.

But we will err tragically if we make competition with the Communists an end in itself. Whatever we do in the name of that competition—improving our race relations, expanding our economy, helping new nations, exploring outer space, and all the rest—we ought to be doing anyway, for its own sake, whether competition exists or not.

Peace is humanity's deepest longing, and with the failure to achieve it all other aspirations fail, too. In acclaiming it as the major expression of our national purpose, however, we must know what sort of peace we mean. Certainly the unjust peace of subjugation, the uneasy peace of cold war or the fruitless peace of an interval between hot wars is far from a goal that will satisfy.

Prosperity, like peace, is desired by all, and our political orators have traditionally held out the goal of personal and national economic well-being as a primary American aim. But the good life falls short as an indicator of national purpose unless it goes hand in hand with the good society. Even in material terms, prosperity is not enough when there is no equal opportunity to share in it; when economic progress means overcrowded cities, abandoned farms, technological unemployment, polluted air and water, and littered parks and countrysides; when those too young to earn are denied their chance to learn; when those no longer earning live out their lives in lonely degradation.

No single one of these four challenges—survival, competition, peace, prosperity—sums up our national purpose today. The creation of a more perfect Union requires the pursuit of a whole series of ideals, ideals which can never be fully attained, but the eternal quest for which embodies the American national purpose:

The fulfillment of every individual's dignity and potential.

The perfection of the democratic process.

The education of every individual to his capacity.

The elimination of ignorance, prejudice, hate and the squalor in which crime is bred.

The elimination of slums, poverty and hunger.

Protection against the economic catastrophes of illness, disability and unemployment.

The achievement of a constantly expanding economy, without inflation or dislocation, either in the factory or on the farm.

The conquest of dread diseases.

The enrichment of American culture.

The attainment of world peace and disarmament, based on world law and order, on the mutual respect of free peoples and on a world economy in which there are no "have-not" or "underdeveloped" nations.

A dream? Of course—the American dream. No candidate for office, unless we were foolish or deceitful, would promise its fulfillment. But we are in urgent need of public men who will work toward its fulfillment, guiding, directing, and encouraging the popular impetus toward that end.

That this impetus exists is beyond question. We are not a people in panic or despair. We have not gone over the hill of history. We have simply, and fortuitously, begun to recognize that somehow we have gotten off the track, and that to get back on we will need stern effort, spirited leadership, and common sacrifice.

If we are to recharge our sense of national purpose, we should accept no invitations to relax on a patent mattress stuffer with woolly illusions labeled peace, prosperity, and normalcy. We should congratulate ourselves not for our country's past glories and present accumulations but for our opportunities for further toil and risk. Rather than take satisfaction in goals already reached, we should be contrite about the goals unreached. We ought not to look for excuses in the budget, but for justifications in the dizzying rush of events and in the harsh realities of our time.

For these are harsh times. The future will not be easier. Our responsibilities will not lessen. Our enemies will not weaken. We must demonstrate that we can meet our responsibility as a free society—that we can by voluntary means match their ruthless exploitation of human, natural, and material resources—that freedom can not only compete and survive but prevail and flourish.

It is not enough to debate: "What is the meaning of America?" Each of us must also decide "What does it mean to be an American?" Upon us destiny has lavished special favors of liberty and opportunity—and it therefore has demanded of us special efforts, particularly in times such as these.

It requires each one of us to be a little more decent, alert, intelligent, compassionate and resolute in our daily lives—that we exercise our civic duties, whether paying taxes or electing Presidents, with extra pride and care—that we use our freedom of choice to pursue our own destiny in a manner that advances the national destiny, in the work we produce, the subjects we study, the positions we seek, the languages we learn, the complaints we voice, the leaders we follow, the inconveniences we endure.

If a dark corner of Africa needs technicians—if a troubled spot in Asia needs language specialists—if a Soviet threat in Berlin requires patience and determination—if the space race requires better schools—we must and can demonstrate that the dedicated efforts of free men can meet these needs better than the efforts of totalitarian compulsion.

Every American must take far more seriously than he has in the past decade his responsibility for achieving and maintaining a democratic society of a truly model kind, worthy to be the champion of freedom throughout the world.

We Americans must again commit ourselves to great ends. We must resume our searching, surging, questing.
